CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FIFTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 2, 1895.

The first Monday of December being the day prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of Congress, the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress commenced this day.

The Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol.

The VICE-PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, of the State of Illinois) called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

PRAYER.

Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we devoutly bless Thee that the men chosen to represent the sovereign States of this Union upon the floor of this body Thou hast had in Thy care and guardianship; that none has been smitten by the shadow feared of man, but all are ready to answer to the roll call of the Senate. Gird them for their responsible and laborious duties. Grant them, and all that are dear to them, help, strength, cheer, and peace.

Amidst our gratulations and joy our hearts of sympathy turn to a darkened home in Iowa, where a wife and daughter sit mourning the departure from them of the husband and father, lately a member of this House. Visit them, O God, who didst shed the tears of sympathy at Bethany, and grant them Thy consolation.

We likewise commend to Thy fatherly goodness the household of an humble and faithful servant of this House, who through many years in his lowly place, by fidelity, courtesy, and stainless character, adorned the doctrines of God his Saviour. We pray that they may find consolation and strength in the faith of the resurrection and eternal life.

Likewise we commend to Thy fatherly tenderness the time-honored officer of this House who for more than threescore years has been present at the opening of every session of Congress, but who now lies upon a bed of affliction, worn with pain and exhausted by suffering. Comfort and bless him, O Lord, and grant to raise him from his couch and bring him back to his accustomed place.

Keep us all by Thy Divine Providence, and grant that by our devotion to Thee in the gospel of Thy Son, in life and death we may be Thine, wholly Thine; and so at the end of this mortal journey come to the land of everlasting life. Through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented the credentials of George L. Shoup, chosen by the legislature of the State of Idaho a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1895; which were read and ordered to be filed.

SWEARING IN OF SENATORS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The names of the newly elected Senators whose credentials are on file will now be called by the Secretary. As their names are called they will please come forward and receive the oath of office.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock m. until otherwise ordered.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. VILAS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VILAS and Mr. ALLISON were appointed.

RECESS.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, the Senate took a recess for one hour; and at the expiration of the recess (at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) reassembled.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 3, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 2, 1895.

This day, in compliance with the provision of the Constitution, the members-elect of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress assembled in their Hall and at 12 o'clock m. were called to order by Mr. JAMES KERR, Clerk of the last House.

The CLERK. The Chaplain of the last House will offer prayer.

Rev. E. B. BAGBY offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, whose kingdom ruleth over all! As we meet together in the halls of legislation we would first unitedly take Thy name upon our lips and acknowledge our dependence upon Thee. Thou art our fathers' God; and we extol Thee. Thou art our God; and we praise Thee. Thou hast never dealt so bountifully with any other nation. The lines have fallen to us in pleasant places; and we have a goodly heritage. We call upon our souls and all that is within us to bless and praise and magnify Thy holy name.

Graciously bless, we beseech Thee, the President of the United States and his Cabinet, the Senate and the House of Representatives, and all that administer the affairs of this nation. May their doings be guided by Thy spirit and ordered by Thy will. Be the God of this nation! Rule Thou in the hearts of our rulers! Satisfy our people with good things, temporal and spiritual; and may all men learn to praise Thee for the riches of grace in Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

The CLERK. Representatives-elect, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, this is the hour fixed by law for the meeting of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States of America. The Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress will read the names of those whose credentials show that they were regularly elected to this body in pursuance of the laws of their respective States and of the United States. As the roll is called, following the alphabetical order of the States, those present will please answer to their names, that we may discover if there is a quorum present.

The CLERK. The Clerk desires to state for the information of members-elect that the roll as called is complete with the exception of the Tenth district of the State of New York and the district of the State of Nevada, credentials from those districts not having yet been filed with the Clerk. The Clerk also desires to present for the information of the House, and in order to make a permanent record, a tabulated statement showing the changes that have occurred since the regular election of members of the Fifty-fourth Congress; and he asks that the same be incorporated in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

List of changes since the regular election of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

District.	Name.	Date of vacancy.	Name of successor.
Fifteenth Pennsylvania.	Myron B. Wright*....	Nov. 13, 1894	James H. Codding.
Tenth New York....	Andrew J. Campbell*	Dec. 6, 1894	A. J. Cummings.
Tenth Illinois.....	Philip S. Post*.....	June 6, 1894	George W. Prince.
Third Michigan	Julius C. Burrows†...	Jan. 23, 1895	Alfred Milnes.
Tenth Georgia.....	James C. C. Black†....	Mar. 4, 1895	James C. C. Black.
Sixth Massachusetts	William Cogswell*....	May 22, 1895	W. H. Moody.
Eighteenth Illinois..	F. Remann*.....	July 14, 1895	W. F. Hadley.

*Died. †Resigned.

The CLERK. It appearing that 341 members have answered to their names, a quorum of the House is present. The first and only business now in order is the election of a Speaker to preside over the deliberations of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Nominations are now in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Clerk, I have the honor to present the name of Hon. THOMAS BRACKETT REED, a Representative in this body from the State of Maine, for the office of Speaker. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Clerk, I have the honor to place in nomination for the same office Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP, a Representative from the State of Georgia. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KEM. Mr. Clerk, I have the honor to nominate for the office of Speaker Hon. JOHN C. BELL, a Representative-elect from the State of Colorado.

The CLERK. Are there any other nominations? [A pause.] If not, the nominations are now closed. The Clerk requests that Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois, Mr. LOUD of California, Mr. CATCHINGS of Mississippi, and Mr. ERDMAN of Pennsylvania act as tellers during the choice of Speaker, as the rules require that the election shall be viva voce. The gentlemen named will please take their places at the Clerk's desk.

The roll call will proceed; the names of members-elect will be called alphabetically.

The tellers having taken their places, the roll was called with the following result:

The CLERK (having restated the report of the tellers). In accordance with the result as reported by the tellers, the Clerk announces that Mr. THOMAS B. REED, a Representative from the State of Maine, having received a majority of all the votes cast, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress. [Loud and long-continued applause.] Mr. CRISP of Georgia, Mr. GROSVENOR of Ohio, and Mr. BELL of Colorado are designated to conduct the Speaker-elect to the chair.

Mr. REED, on appearing with the members designated, was greeted with loud applause, which was renewed when he ascended to the chair.

The CLERK. Mr. HARMER, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania, being the member present who has served longest continuously as a Representative in this body, is designated by the Clerk to administer the prescribed oath of office to the Speaker-elect.

The oath of office being administered by Mr. HARMER,

The SPEAKER addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES: It will not be unbecoming in me, I hope, if I acknowledge to this assembly that it is very agreeable to me to stand once more in the place which I left four years ago. Of the past, however, I shall not speak, for the past speaks for itself [applause] in terms more fitting and appropriate than any words which could come from my lips. Nor shall I speak of the future, for we are not now putting off the harness, but putting it on. Yet I think I may venture to say of the future, in the light of the past, that if we do some things which for the moment seem inadequate it may be that time, which has justified itself of us on many occasions, may do so again. Those who have acted with wisdom heretofore may be fairly expected to act with wisdom hereafter.

I am sorry to say that the pleasure associated with the honor you have bestowed on me, an honor which no American citizen can fail to appreciate and for which I give thanks, is but for the moment, while the cares and responsibilities extend over many days.

So far as the performance of my duties affects the whole people of the United States, I invoke their considerate judgment. So far as it affects the members of this House, I ask from both sides of the Chamber that cordial cooperation without which I can not hope to succeed, assuring them that no effort on my part will be spared to aid them in the performance of their duties by that entire impartiality which is their just due. [Loud applause.]

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER then administered the oath of office, the Members and Delegates presenting themselves, as their names were called by States, in the area in front of the Speaker's desk, and taking the oath required by law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. NEWLANDS of Nevada, has been duly elected to the Fifty-fourth Congress as a Representative from that State; but owing to some cause, which is unknown to him, the credentials have not been forwarded and filed with the Clerk, so that his name has necessarily been left off the roll. I ask unanimous consent, in view of the facts, that Mr. NEWLANDS be now permitted to take the oath of office, notwithstanding the absence of his credentials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, from the Tenth district of the State of New York Mr. CUMMINGS has been elected to fill a vacancy occasioned by death. The local canvassing board has certified the result, but the State board has not yet met. Mr. CUMMINGS is present, and I ask unanimous consent, there being as I understand it no question of contest, that the oath of office be administered also to him, in order that he may take his chances with other members present in the drawing for seats soon to take place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is no question as to the election. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I understand that there is no contest or question respecting the election?

Mr. CRISP. I am so informed.

Mr. DINGLEY. On that statement, I think there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to hear my name called during the roll, and I ask that I may be sworn in at this time.

Mr. GROUT. I also desire the same privilege.

The SPEAKER. Any other gentlemen who may be present, but did not respond when their States were called, may now present themselves, and the oath of office will be administered to them at the same time it is administered to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

The swearing in of members was then concluded.

ELECTION OF CLERK AND OTHER OFFICERS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of completing the organization of the House of Representatives, I offer for immediate adoption the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Alexander McDowell, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives;

That Benjamin F. Russell, of Missouri, be, and he is hereby, chosen Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives;

That William J. Glenn, of the State of New York, be, and he is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives;

That Joseph C. McElroy, of the State of Ohio, be, and he is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives; and

That Henry M. Couden, of the State of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the resolution just read, which I ask to be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That James Kerr, of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and is hereby, chosen Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress;

That Herman W. Snow, of the State of Illinois, be, and is hereby, chosen Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress;

That Alvin B. Hurt, of the State of Tennessee, be, and is hereby, chosen Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress;

That John T. Ross, of the State of Maryland, be, and is hereby, chosen Postmaster of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress; and

That the Rev. Edward B. Bagby, of the State of Virginia, be, and is hereby, chosen Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The question being taken on the substitute offered by Mr. SAYERS, it was rejected.

The original resolution offered by Mr. GROSVENOR was adopted.

The SPEAKER then administered the oath of office to the officers-elect of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COX, its Secretary, informed the House of Representatives that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

Also:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The Vice-President appointed as said committee Mr. VILAS and Mr. ALLISON.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to inform the President of the United States that the House of Representatives has elected THOMAS B. REED, a Representative from the State of Maine, Speaker, and Alexander McDowell, a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE SENATE.

Mr. DALZELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that THOMAS B. REED, a Representative from the State of Maine, has been elected Speaker, and Alexander McDowell, a citizen of Pennsylvania, Clerk; and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

COMMITTEE OF NOTIFICATION.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a resolution, which will be reported to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The resolution was agreed to; and in accordance with the terms thereof the Speaker appointed Mr. PAYNE, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. CRISP.

THE RULES.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered, the rules of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress be adopted as the rules of the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I have no desire to debate the proposition, but I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Since the Fiftieth Congress there has been no proposition of this sort submitted to the House. Prior to and including the Fiftieth Congress it was customary, upon the assembling of each House, to adopt the rules of the preceding House until otherwise ordered. That proposition was departed from in the Fifty-first Congress, and has not obtained since that time, either when that side was in the majority or when this side was in the majority; and the only question which I desire to ask the gentleman is—so that the House may have some information upon the subject—whether it is intended that the House shall have an opportunity, by a report from the Committee on Rules, to pass upon the rules which are to be adopted for the government of the House, or whether, simply by a motion of this sort at this time, without a report, we are to adopt rules which are to obtain during the remainder of the session?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the House finds itself now without rules, except those that might obtain as being ordinarily applicable to parliamentary bodies. It seems to me desirable that the House should adopt rules for its guidance. I will say to the gentleman, however, that opportunity will be offered for the amendment of these rules hereafter.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman, the only point is this—the gentleman sees it well enough—that the adoption of this rule, or this motion, at this time, puts it in the power of the majority of this House, or of a majority of the Committee on Rules, to preclude the discussion of the question afterwards at any time during the existence of this Congress. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman——

Mr. CRISP. One moment. The purpose I had in view was simply to find out whether, if we should agree now—of course we may have to agree whether we wish to or not—but if we should voluntarily agree now that this rule should be adopted, whether it is understood that at an early day we shall have a report from the Committee on Rules on the question of rules? If that be true, of course that will bring up the whole question, and will give any member on this side the right, if he chooses to exercise it, to criticise the rules and to offer a substitute for them. Now, without such an understanding, the adoption of this order or resolution at this time absolutely destroys the right of any man to object to any one of these rules at any time, or to have an opportunity, without the assent of the Committee on Rules and the majority of the House, to make any objection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman I will state that the Fifty-first Congress, after great consideration, adopted rules with which it was content, acting through a small majority. Later on the Fifty-second and the Fifty-third Congresses, in process of evolution, adopted rules that were satisfactory to the majority of the House in those two Congresses. Now, it is evidently proper, as anybody can see, that at the earliest possible moment, if it is practicable to do so, rules should be adopted for the guidance of the House governing the introduction of bills and many other things, so that we may proceed in an orderly manner, for the convenience of members on both sides. It is entirely within the power of the majority to change the rules at any time, and to amend; and while I do not desire to make an agreement about the matter—it being entirely in the power of the majority—I do say to the gentleman that as I understand there is no objection on this side of the House to the proposition that later on opportunity be given for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], or other members, to be heard touching the rules that should govern this House by way of amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois will pardon me——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to know whether it is not the purpose, so far as it has been communicated upon this side of the House, that these rules, at the proper time, shall be referred to the appropriate committee, and reported back, with such amendments as may be thought proper, giving ample opportunity for gentlemen upon the other side to move any amendments to the same that they may see fit?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly; as I understand it.

Mr. CRISP. My point is simply this: So far as I am concerned, I do not wish in any way to interfere with the adoption of temporary rules. I merely desire to have the right at some time to criticise the rules, if it be deemed desirable to do so.

The resolution was agreed to.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, and ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That until otherwise ordered the daily hour of meeting of the House of Representatives shall be 12 o'clock meridian.

The resolution was agreed to.

DRAWING OF SEATS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe the usual formal resolutions completing the organization of the House have been adopted; and as it is understood that the message of the President will not be sent in to-day, there is ample opportunity for the drawing of seats. In order to reach that business, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House do now proceed to draw seats for Members and Delegates of the present Congress in pursuance of Rule XXXII of the last House, and when names of members absent from the city or on account of sickness are called that seats be selected for them by their colleagues.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I believe it has been the custom, since the beginning of the Fifty-first Congress, to allow ex-Speakers of the House of Representatives to select their seats without participating in the drawing. I offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that after the adoption of the resolution I have offered it is customary to ask unanimous consent that ex-Speakers be allowed to choose their seats. That has been done by unanimous consent; and I prefer that the resolution should be adopted as offered.

Mr. McCREARY. I have no objection; and then I will offer this proposition.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that ex-Speakers of the House of Representatives be allowed to select their seats prior to the drawing. That would include the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is accordingly agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a statement of interest to the House in reference to the selection of seats. Ordinarily, when the membership of the two leading parties is nearly equal, the custom has obtained that gentlemen members of the Republican party for their convenience have selected seats upon the left of the aisle, and gentlemen of the Democratic party seats on the right of the aisle; but at the present time, as in the Fifty-second Congress, there is so great a disproportion in the number of members of the two leading parties that it is impracticable, of course, to do this. It will be remembered by some gentlemen present that in the Fifty-second Congress, prior to the drawing, an agreement was made that the Republican members should select from this side of the aisle [standing in the first aisle to the left of the main aisle] for the first two blocks, that in the last two blocks selections be made indiscriminately, and that in the aisle to my left, and on all the other side of the main aisle, the members of the Democratic party should select their seats.

It has been suggested, after a conference between gentlemen on both sides of the House, that the same arrangement reversed, the political parties being now reversed, should obtain at the present time. I have conferred with gentlemen upon both sides of the House, and especially with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], and, so far as I know, this arrangement meets with approval.

Mr. CRISP. The exact matter as it appears in the RECORD is as stated by the gentleman from Maine. As there are only a few words, I will read:

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I beg to make a statement to the House. An informal conference between members on both sides of the House has resulted in a suggestion which will be acceptable to members on both sides—that in the drawing of seats this side—

That was then the Democratic side—will take the seats on this side of the aisle and the first block of seats on the right-hand side of the aisle—

That is, the block in which the gentleman stands—

or opposite, that the Republicans will take the two next blocks of seats and the remaining seats will be selected as gentlemen may choose on drawing.

That was the agreement reached at that time. That is the agreement, as I understand, the gentleman now proposes. So far as I am concerned, it is entirely satisfactory.

A MEMBER. Under that rule that side of the House would take all of that side and the first block on this side to the right of the main aisle.

Mr. CRISP. The minority, in this case the Democratic party, would occupy first, exclusively, these two blocks of seats, and then the excess of members not so accommodated would take their chances in the last two blocks.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is simply the plan which was adopted in the Fifty-second Congress reversed.

Mr. CRISP. That is agreeable to gentlemen on this side, so far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, in order that the House may be in full possession of the facts pertaining to this matter, it is not, I hope, inappropriate for me to add to what has been stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], that while they have stated correctly the plan adopted in the Fifty-second Congress, yet, in the succeeding Congress, when the majority was still large, a similar proposition was made by our side, but was objected to on the other side because it was claimed that the plan had worked hardship by giving too great an advantage to the majority. I think the RECORD will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct my friend from Tennessee. The objection was not that the plan had worked hardship, but that in the succeeding Congress the Republican membership had largely increased, so that what had been just in the Fifty-second Congress was not so in the Fifty-third, because of the changed conditions.

Mr. McMILLIN. I may be in error as to the motive of the objection, which I have stated only from the impression left on my mind, but the fact remains that objection was made.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the gentleman on one point. The objection came, not from this side of the House, but from Mr. SIMPSON, a Populist member from Kansas.

Mr. DINGLEY. And the objection was not that the plan had not worked well in the preceding Congress, but that the conditions had changed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It was an objection that was raised because gentlemen desired another arrangement.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that no objection is made now to the proposition I have submitted.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement can be carried out by common consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to have Rule XXXII read.

REPORT OF THE RETIRING CLERK.

The SPEAKER. Before that is done the Chair will submit the report of the retiring Clerk of the House, with a letter transmitting a list of contested-election cases. Without objection these documents will be received and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The letter transmitting the list of contested-election cases is as follows:

CONTESTED ELECTION CASES.

Letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting a list of the contests for seats in the House of Representatives of the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States.

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1895.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives a list of contests for seats in the House of Representatives for the Fifty-fourth Congress of the United States, notices of which have been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House, and also to transmit therewith all original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto, as follows, to wit:

State of Alabama.—Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Congressional districts.
State of Georgia.—Seventh Congressional district.
State of Illinois.—Third and Sixteenth Congressional districts.
State of Kentucky.—Seventh and Tenth Congressional districts.
State of Louisiana.—Second, Third, and Fifth Congressional districts.
State of Maryland.—Third Congressional district.
State of Missouri.—Fifth Congressional district.
State of Mississippi.—Seventh Congressional district.
State of New York.—Eighth, Ninth, and Twelfth Congressional districts.
State of North Carolina.—Second, Third, and Sixth Congressional districts.
State of South Carolina.—First, Third, Sixth, and Seventh Congressional districts.
State of Texas.—Fourth, Sixth, and Tenth Congressional districts.
State of Virginia.—Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Tenth Congressional districts.

The Clerk wishes also to state that he has opened and printed the testimony in all the above cases excepting in the contest from the Third Congressional district of Illinois, Hugh R. Belknap vs. Lawrence E. McGann, the testimony not being filed within the time required by law.

Also in the contest from the Third Congressional district of Louisiana, Taylor Beattie vs. Andrew Price, the testimony not all being filed at the time fixed for the opening of the same, as required by law, viz, August 15, 1895. The case was continued and the testimony remains unopened.

Also in the contest from the Eighth Congressional district of New York, J. Murray Mitchell vs. James J. Walsh, and the Ninth Congressional district of New York, Timothy J. Campbell vs. Henry C. Miner. In neither of these cases has the contestee filed any testimony, and the testimony of the contestants having been filed after the time required by law the Clerk did not think it proper to open the testimony in either case, but to submit the same for the consideration of the House.

In the Twelfth Congressional district of New York, R. A. Cheesebrough vs. George B. McClellan; the Seventh Congressional district of Mississippi, A. M. Newman vs. J. G. Spencer, and the Fourth Congressional district of Texas, J. H. Davis vs. D. B. Culberson, there are filed with the Clerk notices of contest, together with copies of the answers of contestees, and the affidavit of the contestee in each case that no testimony has been taken.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested elections," such portions of the testimony in the above cases (with the exceptions referred to) as the parties in interest agreed upon, or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest and the answers thereto; and such portions of the testimony as were not printed, with all the original papers, have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in each case have been mailed to the contestant and the same number to the contestee. The law in reference to the briefs of both the contestee and contestant in each case has been complied with as far as possible upon the receipt by the Clerk of said briefs. Owing to delays in this matter, over which the Clerk has no control, all of said briefs have not yet been returned to him by the parties to these contests; but so far as the briefs have been furnished to the Clerk they are also ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections upon the order of the House, together with a tabulated statement, which has been prepared by the Clerk, showing the number of pages of testimony and the present status of each and every contested-election case, as well as the docket which has been kept, and all the papers in connection therewith.

Very respectfully,

JAMES KERR,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

DRAWING OF SEATS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the rule under which the House is proceeding.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXXII—DRAWING OF SEATS.

1. At the commencement of each Congress, immediately after the Members and Delegates are sworn in, the Clerk shall place in a box, prepared for that purpose, a number of small balls of marble or other material equal to the number of Members and Delegates, which balls shall be consecutively numbered and thoroughly intermingled, and at such hour as shall be fixed by the House for that purpose, by the hands of a page, draw said balls one by one from the box and announce the number as it is drawn, upon which announcement the Member or Delegate whose name on a numbered alphabetical list shall correspond with the number on the ball shall advance and choose his seat for the term for which he is elected.

2. Before said drawing shall commence each seat shall be vacated and so remain until selected under this rule, and any seat having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished, and whenever the seats of Members and Delegates shall have been drawn, no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress.

The SPEAKER. In order to carry out the resolution as to the selection of seats under the rule, it will be necessary for members to retire from the body of the Hall.

The members present retired behind the railing.

The SPEAKER. Before the drawing for seats begins the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], who have been authorized by the House to choose seats in advance, will please make their selections.

Mr. CRISP and Mr. GROW accordingly chose seats.

The SPEAKER. Members will please remain outside the railing during the drawing. When gentlemen come inside while the drawing is in progress there is likely to be misunderstanding as to what seats are occupied and confusion arises which had better be avoided. The drawing will now begin.

The drawing of seats was begun at seven minutes before 2 o'clock p. m., and concluded at thirty-two minutes past 3.

PRINTING OF THE RULES.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the House 500 copies of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LINTON: A bill (H. R. 1) to reclassify railway postal clerks and prescribe their salaries—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ALDRICH: A bill (H. R. 2) disposing of two condemned cannon—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 3) to provide for the relief of aged and disabled letter carriers—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4) making ineligible for appointment as assignee or receiver officers of corporations engaged in interstate commerce—to the Committee on Commerce.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ALDRICH: Resolution of the National Board of Trade, asking Congress to pass a law making officers of public corporations ineligible for receivership—to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 3, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

GEORGE GRAY, a Senator from the State of Delaware, JOHN M. PALMER, a Senator from the State of Illinois, and JOHN P. JONES, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. T. O. TOWLES, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate and delivered the following message:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives has assembled; that THOMAS B. REED, a Representative from the State of Maine, has been elected Speaker; that Alexander McDowell, a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania, has been elected Clerk, and that the House is ready to proceed to business.

Also, that a committee of three has been appointed by the Speaker on the part of the House of Representatives, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of each of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make; and that Mr. PAYNE, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, and Mr. CRISP have been appointed such committee on the part of the House.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. VILAS and Mr. ALLISON, the committee appointed in conjunction with a similar committee of the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and

Mr. VILAS said: Mr. President, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each of the Houses of Congress has assembled and is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, have performed the duty assigned them, and were requested by the President to give his respectful salutation to the Houses of Congress and to say that he will immediately communicate to each House a message in writing.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared below the bar, and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received from the secretary and handed to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the message of the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary (Mr. WILLIAM R. COX) read the message, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The present assemblage of the legislative branch of our Government occurs at a time when the interests of our people and the needs of the country give especial prominence to the condition of our foreign relations and the exigencies of our national finances. The reports of the heads of the several administrative Departments of the Government fully and plainly exhibit what has been accomplished within the scope of their respective duties and present such recommendations for the betterment of our country's condition as patriotic and intelligent labor and observation suggest.

I therefore deem my executive duty adequately performed at this time by presenting to the Congress the important phases of our situation as related to our intercourse with foreign nations, and a statement of the financial problems which confront us, omitting, except as they are related to these topics, any reference to departmental operations.

I earnestly invite, however, not only the careful consideration, but the severely critical scrutiny of the Congress and my fellow-countrymen to the reports concerning these departmental operations. If justly and fairly examined they will furnish proof of assiduous and painstaking care for the public welfare. I press the recommendations they contain upon the respectful attention of those charged with the duty of legislation, because I believe their adoption would promote the people's good.

By amendatory tariff legislation in January last, the Argentine Republic, recognizing the value of the large market opened to the free importation of its wools under our last tariff act, has admitted certain products of the United States to entry at reduced duties. It is pleasing to note that the efforts we have made to enlarge the exchanges of trade on a sound basis of mutual benefit are in this instance appreciated by the country from which our woolen factories draw their needful supply of raw material.

The Missions boundary dispute between the Argentine Republic and Brazil, referred to the President of the United States as arbitrator during the term of my predecessor, and which was submitted to me for determination, resulted in an award in favor of Brazil upon the historical and documentary evidence presented, thus ending a long-protracted controversy and again demonstrating the wisdom and desirability of settling international boundary disputes by recourse to friendly arbitration.

Negotiations are progressing for a revival of the United States and Chilean Claims Commission, whose work was abruptly terminated last year by the expiration of the stipulated time within which awards could be made.

The resumption of specie payments by Chile is a step of great interest and importance both in its direct consequences upon her own welfare and as evincing the ascendency of sound financial principles in one of the most influential of the South American Republics.

The close of the momentous struggle between China and Japan, while relieving the diplomatic agents of this Government from the delicate duty they undertook at the request of both countries, of rendering such service to the subjects of either belligerent within the territorial limits of the other as our neutral position permitted, developed a domestic condition in the Chinese Empire which has caused much anxiety and called for prompt and careful attention. Either as a result of a weak control by the central Government over the provincial administrations, following a diminution of traditional governmental authority under the stress of an overwhelming national disaster, or as a manifestation upon good opportunity of the aversion of the Chinese population to all foreign ways and undertakings, there have occurred in widely separated provinces of China serious outbreaks of the old fanatical spirit against foreigners, which, unchecked by the local authorities, if not actually connived at by them, have culminated in mob attacks on foreign missionary stations, causing much destruction of property, and attended with personal injuries as well as loss of life.

Although but one American citizen was reported to have been actually wounded, and although the destruction of property may have fallen more heavily upon the missionaries of other nationalities than our own, it plainly behooved this Government to take the most prompt and decided action to guard against similar or perhaps more dreadful calamities befalling the hundreds of American mission stations which have grown up throughout the interior of China under the temperate rule of toleration, custom, and imperial edict. The demands of the United States and other powers for the degradation and punishment of the responsible officials of the respective cities and provinces who by neglect or otherwise had permitted uprisings, and for the adoption of stern measures by the Emperor's Government for the protection of the life and property of foreigners, were followed by the disgrace and dismissal of certain provincial officials found derelict in duty, and the punishment by death of a number of those adjudged guilty of actual participation in the outrages.

This Government also insisted that a special American commission should visit the province where the first disturbances occurred, for the purpose of investigation. This latter commission, formed after much opposition, has gone overland from Tientsin, accompanied by a suitable Chinese escort, and by its demonstration of the readiness and ability of our Government to protect its citizens, will act, it is believed, as a most influential deterrent of any similar outbreaks.

The energetic steps we have thus taken are all the more likely to result in future safety to our citizens in China, because the Imperial Government is, I am persuaded, entirely convinced that we desire only the liberty and protection of our own citizens and redress for any wrongs they may have suffered, and that we have no ulterior designs or objects, political or otherwise. China will not forget either our kindly service to her citizens during her late war, nor the further fact that, while furnishing all the facilities at our command to further the negotiations of peace between her and Japan, we sought no advantages and interposed no counsel.

The Governments of both China and Japan have in special dispatches transmitted through their respective diplomatic representatives expressed in a most pleasing manner their grateful appreciation of our assistance to their citizens during the unhappy struggle and of the value of our aid in paving the way to their resumption of peaceful relations.

The customary cordial relations between this country and France have been undisturbed, with the exception that a full explanation of the treatment of John L. Waller by the expeditionary military authorities of France still remains to be given. Mr. Waller, formerly United States consul at Tamatave, remained in Madagascar after his term of office expired, and was apparently successful in procuring business concessions from the Hovas of greater or less value. After the occupation of Tamatave and the declaration of martial law by the French he was arrested upon various charges, among them that of communicating military information to the enemies of France, was tried and convicted by a military tribunal, and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment.

Following the course justified by abundant precedents, this Government requested from that of France the record of the proceedings of the French tribunal which resulted in Mr. Waller's condemnation. This request has been complied with to the extent of supplying a copy of the official record, from which appear the constitution and organization of the court, the charges as formulated, and the general course and result of the trial, and by which it is shown that the accused was tried in open court and was defended by counsel. But the evidence adduced in support of the charges—which was not received by the French minister for foreign affairs till the first week in October—has thus far been withheld, the French Government taking the ground that its production in response to our demand would establish a bad precedent. The efforts of our ambassador to procure it, however, though impeded by recent changes in the French ministry, have not been relaxed, and it is confidently expected that some satisfactory solution of the matter will shortly be reached. Meanwhile it appears that Mr. Waller's confinement has every alleviation which the state of his health and all the other circumstances of the case demand or permit.

In agreeable contrast to the difference above noted respecting a matter of common concern where nothing is sought except such a mutually satisfactory outcome as the true merits of the case require is the recent resolution of the French Chambers favoring the conclusion of a permanent treaty of arbitration between the two countries.

An invitation has been extended by France to the Government and people of the United States to participate in a great international exposition at Paris in 1900 as a suitable commemoration of the close of this the world's marvelous century of progress. I heartily recommend its acceptance, together with such legislation as will adequately provide for a due representation of this Government and its people on the occasion.

Our relations with the States of the German Empire are, in some aspects, typical of a condition of things elsewhere found in countries whose productions and trade are similar to our own. The close rivalries of competing industries; the influence of the delusive doctrine that the internal development of a nation is promoted and its wealth increased by a policy which in undertaking to reserve its home markets for the exclusive use of its own producers necessarily obstructs their sales in foreign markets and prevents free access to the products of the world; the desire to retain trade in time-worn ruts, regardless of the inexorable laws of new needs and changed conditions of demand and supply, and our own halting tardiness in inviting a freer exchange of commodities and by this means imperiling our footing in the external markets naturally open to us, have created a situation somewhat injurious to American export interests, not only in Germany, where they are perhaps most noticeable, but in adjacent countries. The exports affected are largely American cattle and other food products, the reason assigned for unfavorable discrimination being that their consumption is deleterious to the public health. This is all the more irritating in view of the fact that no European State is as jealous of the excellence and wholesomeness of its exported food supplies as the United States, nor so easily able, on account of inherent soundness, to guarantee those qualities.

Nor are these difficulties confined to our food products designed for exportation. Our great insurance companies, for example, having built up a vast business abroad and invested a large share of their gains in foreign countries in compliance with the local laws and regulations then existing, now find themselves within a narrowing circle of onerous and unforeseen conditions, and are confronted by the necessity of retirement from a field thus made unprofitable, if indeed they are not summarily expelled, as some of them have lately been from Prussia.

It is not to be forgotten that international trade can not be one-sided. Its currents are alternating and its movements should be honestly reciprocal. Without this it almost necessarily degenerates into a device to gain advantage or a contrivance to secure benefits with only the semblance of a return. In our dealings with other nations we ought to be openhanded and scrupulously fair. This should be our policy as a producing nation, and it plainly becomes us as a people who love generosity and the moral aspects of national good faith and reciprocal forbearance.

These considerations should not, however, constrain us to submit to unfair discrimination nor to silently acquiesce in vexatious hindrances to the enjoyment of our share of the legitimate advantages of proper trade relations. If an examination of the situation suggests such measures on our part as would involve restrictions similar to those from which we suffer, the way to such a course is easy. It should, however, by no means be lightly entered upon, since the necessity for the inauguration of such a policy would be regretted by the best sentiment of our people, and because it naturally and logically might lead to consequences of the gravest character.

I take pleasure in calling to your attention the encomiums bestowed on those vessels of our new Navy which took part in the notable ceremony of the opening of the Kiel Canal. It was fitting that this extraordinary achievement of the newer German nationality should be celebrated in the presence of America's exposition of the latest developments of the world's naval energy.

Our relations with Great Britain, always intimate and important, have demanded during the past year even a greater share of consideration than is usual.

Several vexatious questions were left undetermined by the decision of the Bering Sea Arbitration Tribunal. The application of the principles laid down by that august body has not been followed by the results they were intended to accomplish, either because the principles themselves lacked in breadth and definiteness or because their execution has been more or less imperfect. Much correspondence has been exchanged between the two Governments on the subject of preventing the exterminating slaughter of seals. The insufficiency of the British patrol of Bering Sea, under the regulations agreed on by the two Governments, has been pointed out, and yet only two British ships have been on police duty during this season in those waters.

The need of a more effective enforcement of existing regulations, as well as the adoption of such additional regulations as experience has shown to be absolutely necessary to carry out the intent of the award, have been earnestly urged upon the British Government, but thus far without effective results. In the meantime the depletion of the seal herds by means of pelagic hunting has so alarmingly progressed that unless their slaughter is at once effectively checked their extinction within a few years seems to be a matter of absolute certainty.

The understanding by which the United States was to pay, and Great Britain to receive, a lump sum of $425,000 in full settlement of all British claims for damages arising from our seizure of British sealing vessels unauthorized under the award of the Paris Tribunal of Arbitration was not confirmed by the last Congress, which declined to make the necessary appropriation. I am still of the opinion that this arrangement was a judicious and advantageous one for the Government, and I earnestly recommend that it be again considered and sanctioned. If, however, this does not meet with the favor of Congress, it certainly will hardly dissent from the proposition that the Government is bound by every consideration of honor and good faith to provide for the speedy adjustment of these claims by arbitration as the only other alternative. A treaty of arbitration has therefore been agreed upon, and will be immediately laid before the Senate, so that in one of the modes suggested a final settlement may be reached.

Notwithstanding that Great Britain originated the proposal to enforce international rules for the prevention of collisions at sea, based on the recommendations of the Maritime Conference of Washington, and concurred in suggesting March 1, 1895, as the date to be set by proclamation for carrying these rules into general effect, Her Majesty's Government, having encountered opposition on the part of British shipping interests, announced its inability to accept that date, which was consequently canceled. The entire matter is still in abeyance, without prospect of a better condition in the near future.

The commissioners appointed to mark the international boundary in Passamaquoddy Bay according to the description of the treaty of Ghent have not yet fully agreed.

The completion of the preliminary survey of that Alaskan boundary which follows the contour of the coast from the southernmost point of Prince of Wales Island until it strikes the one hundred and forty-first meridian at or near the summit of Mount St. Elias awaits further necessary appropriation, which is urgently recommended. This survey was undertaken under the provisions of the convention entered into by this country and Great Britain July 22, 1892, and the supplementary convention of February 3, 1894.

As to the remaining section of the Alaskan boundary, which follows the one hundred and forty-first meridian northwardly from Mount St. Elias to the Frozen Ocean, the settlement of which involves the physical location of the meridian mentioned, no conventional agreement has yet been made. The ascertainment of a given meridian at a particular point is a work requiring much time and careful observations and surveys. Such observations and surveys were undertaken by the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey in 1890 and 1891, while similar work in the same quarters under British auspices are believed to give nearly coincident results; but these surveys have been independently conducted and no international agreement to mark those or any other parts of the one hundred and forty-first meridian by permanent monuments has yet been made. In the meantime the valley of the Yukon is becoming a highway through the hitherto unexplored wilds of Alaska, and abundant mineral wealth has been discovered in that region, especially at or near the junction of the boundary meridian with the Yukon and its tributaries. In these circumstances it is expedient, and, indeed, imperative, that the jurisdictional limits of the respective Governments in this new region be speedily determined. Her Britannic Majesty's Government has proposed a joint delimitation of the one hundred and forty-first meridian by an international commission of experts, which, if Congress will authorize it and make due provision therefor, can be accomplished with no unreasonable delay. It is impossible to overlook the vital importance of continuing the work already entered upon, and supplementing it by further effective measures looking to the exact location of this entire boundary line.

I call attention to the unsatisfactory delimitation of the respective jurisdictions of the United States and the Dominion of Canada in the Great Lakes at the approaches to the narrow waters that connect them. The waters in question are frequented by fishermen of both nationalities and their nets are there used. Owing to the uncertainty and ignorance as to the true boundary, vexatious disputes and injurious seizures of boats and nets by Canadian cruisers often occur, while any positive settlement thereof by an accepted standard is not easily to be reached. A joint commission to determine the line in those quarters, on a practical basis, by measured courses following range marks on shore, is a necessity for which immediate provision should be made.

It being apparent that the boundary dispute between Great Britain and the Republic of Venezuela concerning the limits of British Guiana was approaching an acute stage, a definite statement of the interest and policy of the United States as regards the controversy seemed to be required both on its own account and in view of its relations with the friendly powers directly concerned. In July last, therefore, a dispatch was addressed to our ambassador at London for communication to the British Government, in which the attitude of the United States was fully and distinctly set forth. The general conclusions therein reached and formulated are in substance that the traditional and established policy of this Government is firmly opposed to a forcible increase by any European power of its territorial possessions on this continent; that this policy is as well founded in principle as it is strongly supported by numerous precedents; that as a consequence the United States is bound to protest against the enlargement of the area of British Guiana in derogation of the rights and against the will of Venezuela; that considering the disparity in strength of Great Britain and Venezuela, the territorial dispute between them can be reasonably settled only by friendly and impartial arbitration, and that the resort to such arbitration should include the whole controversy, and is not satisfied if one of the powers concerned is permitted to draw an arbitrary line through the territory in debate and to declare that it will submit to arbitration only the portion lying on one side of it. In view of these conclusions, the dispatch in question called upon the British Government for a definite answer to the question whether it would or would not submit the territorial controversy between itself and Venezuela in its entirety to impartial arbitration. The answer of the British Government has not yet been received, but is expected shortly, when further communication on the subject will probably be made to the Congress.

Early in January last an uprising against the Government of Hawaii was promptly suppressed. Martial law was forwith proclaimed and numerous arrests were made of persons suspected of being in sympathy with the Royalist party. Among these were several citizens of the United States, who were either convicted by a military court and sentenced to death, imprisonment, or fine, or were deported without trial. The United States, while denying protection to such as had taken the Hawaiian oath of allegiance, insisted that martial law, though altering the forms of justice, could not supersede justice itself, and demanded stay of execution until the proceedings had been submitted to this Government and knowledge obtained therefrom that our citizens had received fair trial. The death sentences were subsequently commuted or were remitted on condition of leaving the islands. The cases of certain Americans arrested and expelled by arbitrary order without formal charge or trial have had attention, and in some instances have been found to justify remonstrance and a claim for indemnity, which Hawaii has not thus far conceded.

Mr. Thurston, the Hawaiian minister, having furnished this Government abundant reason for asking that he be recalled, that course was pursued, and his successor has lately been received.

The deplorable lynching of several Italian laborers in Colorado was naturally followed by international representations, and I am happy to say that the best efforts of the State in which the outrages occurred have been put forth to discover and punish the authors of this atrocious crime. The dependent families of some of the unfortunate victims invite by their deplorable condition gracious provision for their needs.

These manifestations against helpless aliens may be traced through successive stages to the vicious padroni system, which, unchecked by our immigration and contract-labor statutes, controls these workers from the moment of landing on our shores, and farms them out in distant and often rude regions, where their cheapening competition in the fields of bread-winning toil brings them into collision with other labor interests. While welcoming, as we should, those who seek our shores to merge themselves in our body politic and win personal competence by honest effort, we can not regard such assemblages of distinctively alien laborers, hired out in the mass to the profit of alien speculators and shipped hither and thither as the prospect of gain may dictate, as otherwise than repugnant to the spirit of our civilization, deterrent to individual advancement, and hindrances to the building up of stable communities resting upon the wholesome ambitions of the citizen and constituting the prime factor in the prosperity and progress of our nation. If legislation can reach this growing evil, it certainly should be attempted.

Japan has furnished abundant evidence of her vast gain in every trait and characteristic that constitutes a nation's greatness. We have reason for congratulation in the fact that the Government of the United States, by the exchange of liberal treaty stipulations with the new Japan, was the first to recognize her wonderful advance and to extend to her the consideration and confidence due to her national enlightenment and progressive character.

The boundary dispute which lately threatened to embroil Guatemala and Mexico has happily yielded to pacific counsels, and its determination has, by the joint agreement of the parties, been submitted to the sole arbitration of the United States minister to Mexico.

The commission appointed under the convention of February 18, 1889, to set new monuments along the boundary between the United States and Mexico has completed its task.

As a sequel to the failure of a scheme for the colonization in Mexico of negroes, mostly emigrants from Alabama under contract, a great number of these helpless and suffering people, starving and smitten with contagious disease, made their way or were assisted to the frontier, where, in wretched plight, they were quarantined by the Texas authorities. Learning of their destitute condition, I directed rations to be temporarily furnished them through the War Department. At the expiration of their quarantine they were conveyed by the railway companies at comparatively nominal rates to their homes in Alabama, upon my assurance, in the absence of any fund available for the cost of their transportation, that I would recommend to Congress an appropriation for its payment. I now strongly urge upon Congress the propriety of making such an appropriation. It should be remembered that the measures taken were dictated not only by sympathy and humanity, but by a conviction that it was not compatible with the dignity of this Government that so large a body of our dependent citizens should be thrown for relief upon the charity of a neighboring State.

In last year's message I narrated at some length the jurisdictional questions then freshly arisen in the Mosquito Indian strip of Nicaragua. Since that time, by the voluntary act of the Mosquito Nation, the territory reserved to them has been incorporated with Nicaragua, the Indians formally subjecting themselves to be governed by the general laws and regulations of the Republic instead of by their own customs and regulations, and thus availing themselves of a privilege secured to them by the treaty between Nicaragua and Great Britain of January 28, 1860.

After this extension of uniform Nicaraguan administration to the Mosquito strip, the case of the British vice-consul, Hatch, and of several of his countrymen who had been summarily expelled from Nicaragua and treated with considerable indignity, provoked a claim by Great Britain upon Nicaragua for pecuniary indemnity, which, upon Nicaragua's refusal to admit liability, was enforced by Great Britain. While the sovereignty and jurisdiction of Nicaragua was in no way questioned by Great Britain, the former's arbitrary conduct in regard to British subjects furnished the ground for this proceeding.

A British naval force occupied without resistance the Pacific seaport of Corinto, but was soon after withdrawn upon the promise that the sum demanded would be paid. Throughout this incident the kindly offices of the United States were invoked and were employed in favor of as peaceful a settlement and as much consideration and indulgence toward Nicaragua as were consistent with the nature of the case. Our efforts have since been made the subject of appreciative and grateful recognition by Nicaragua.

The coronation of the Czar of Russia at Moscow in May next invites the ceremonial participation of the United States, and in accordance with usage and diplomatic propriety our minister to the imperial court has been directed to represent our Government on the occasion.

Correspondence is on foot touching the practice of Russian consuls within the jurisdiction of the United States to interrogate citizens as to their race and religious faith, and upon ascertainment thereof to deny to Jews authentication of passports or legal documents for use in Russia. Inasmuch as such a proceeding imposes a disability, which in the case of succession to property in Russia may be found to infringe the treaty rights of our citizens, and which is an obnoxious invasion of our territorial jurisdiction, it has elicited fitting remonstrance, the result of which it is hoped will remove the cause of complaint.

The pending claims of sealing vessels of the United States seized in Russian waters remain unadjusted. Our recent convention with Russia establishing a modus vivendi as to imperial jurisdiction in such cases has prevented further difficulty of this nature.

The Russian Government has welcomed in principle our suggestion for a modus vivendi, to embrace Great Britain and Japan, looking to the better preservation of seal life in the North Pacific and Bering Sea, and the extension of the protected area defined by the Paris Tribunal to all Pacific waters north of the thirty-fifth parallel. It is especially noticeable that Russia favors prohibition of the use of firearms in seal hunting throughout the proposed area and a longer closed season for pelagic sealing.

In my last two annual messages I called the attention of the Congress to the position we occupied as one of the parties to a treaty or agreement by which we became jointly bound with England and Germany to so interfere with the government and control of Samoa as in effect to assume the management of its affairs. On the 9th day of May, 1894, I transmitted to the Senate a special message with accompanying documents giving information on the subject and emphasizing the opinion I have at all times entertained, that our situation in this matter was inconsistent with the mission and traditions of our Government, in violation of the principles we profess, and in all its phases mischievous and vexatious.

I again press this subject upon the attention of the Congress and ask for such legislative action or expression as will lead the way to our relief from obligations both irksome and unnatural.

Cuba is again gravely disturbed. An insurrection, in some respects more active than the last preceding revolt, which continued from 1868 to 1878, now exists in a large part of the eastern interior of the island, menacing even some populations on the coast. Besides deranging the commercial exchanges of the island, of which our country takes the predominant share, this flagrant condition of hostilities, by arousing sentimental sympathy and inciting adventurous support among our people, has entailed earnest effort on the part of this Government to enforce obedience to our neutrality laws and to prevent the territory of the United States from being abused as a vantage ground from which to aid those in arms against Spanish sovereignty.

Whatever may be the traditional sympathy of our countrymen as individuals with a people who seem to be struggling for larger autonomy and greater freedom, deepened as such sympathy naturally must be in behalf of our neighbors, yet the plain duty of their Government is to observe in good faith the recognized obligations of international relationship. The performance of this duty should not be made more difficult by a disregard on the part of our citizens of the obligations growing out of their allegiance to their country, which should restrain them from violating as individuals the neutrality which the nation of which they are members is bound to observe in its relations to friendly sovereign States. Though neither the warmth of our people's sympathy with the Cuban insurgents, nor our loss and material damage consequent upon the futile endeavors thus far made to restore peace and order, nor any shock our humane sensibilities may have received from the cruelties which appear to especially characterize this sanguinary and fiercely conducted war, have in the least shaken the determination of the Government to honestly fulfill every international obligation, yet it is to be earnestly hoped, on every ground, that the devastation of armed conflict may speedily be stayed and order and quiet restored to the distracted island, bringing in their train the activity and thrift of peaceful pursuits.

One notable instance of interference by Spain with passing American ships has occurred. On March 8 last the Allianca, while bound from Colon to New York, and following the customary track for vessels near the Cuban shore, but outside the 3-mile limit, was fired upon by a Spanish gunboat. Protest was promptly made by the United States against this act as not being justified by a state of war, nor permissible in respect of vessels on the usual paths of commerce, nor tolerable in view of the wanton peril occasioned to innocent life and property. The act was disavowed, with full expression of regret, and assurance of nonrecurrence of such just cause of complaint, while the offending officer was relieved of his command.

Military arrests of citizens of the United States in Cuba have occasioned frequent reclamations. Where held on criminal charges their delivery to the ordinary civil jurisdiction for trial has been demanded and obtained in conformity with treaty provisions, and where merely detained by way of military precaution under a proclaimed state of siege, without formulated accusation, their release or trial has been insisted upon. The right of American consular officers in the island to prefer protests and demands in such cases having been questioned by the insular authority, their enjoyment of the privilege stipulated by treaty for the consuls of Germany was claimed under the most-favored-nation provision of our own convention and was promptly recognized.

The long-standing demand of Antonio Maximo Mora against Spain has at last been settled by the payment, on the 14th of September last, of the sum originally agreed upon in liquidation of the claim. Its distribution among the parties entitled to receive it has proceeded as rapidly as the rights of those claiming the fund could be safely determined.

The enforcement of the differential duties against products of this country exported to Cuba and Puerto Rico prompted the immediate claim on our part to the benefit of the minimum tariff of Spain in return for the most favorable treatment permitted by our laws as regards the production of Spanish territories. A commercial arrangement was concluded in January last securing the treatment so claimed.

Vigorous protests against excessive fines imposed on our ships and merchandise by the customs officers of these islands for trivial errors have resulted in the remission of such fines in instances where the equity of the complaint was apparent, though the vexatious practice has not been wholly discontinued.

Occurrences in Turkey have continued to excite concern. The reported massacres of Christians in Armenia and the development there and in other districts of a spirit of fanatic hostility to Christian influences naturally excited apprehension for the safety of the devoted men and women who, as dependents of the foreign missionary societies in the United States, reside in Turkey under the guarantee of law and usage and in the legitimate performance of their educational and religious mission. No efforts have been spared in their behalf, and their protection in person and property has been earnestly and vigorously enforced by every means within our power.

I regret, however, that an attempt on our part to obtain better information concerning the true condition of affairs in the disturbed quarter of the Ottoman Empire, by sending thither the United States consul at Sivas to make investigation and report, was thwarted by the objections of the Turkish Government. This movement on our part was in no sense meant as a gratuitous entanglement of the United States in the so-called Eastern question, nor as an officious interference with the right and duty which belong by treaty to certain great European powers, calling for their intervention in political matters affecting the good government and religious freedom of the non-Mussulman subjects of the Sultan, but it arose solely from our desire to have an accurate knowledge of the conditions in our efforts to care for those entitled to our protection.

The presence of our naval vessels which are now in the vicinity of the disturbed localities affords opportunities to acquire a measure of familiarity with the condition of affairs, and will enable us to take suitable steps for the protection of any interests of our countrymen within reach of our ships that might be found imperiled.

The Ottoman Government has lately issued an imperial iradé exempting forever from taxation an American college for girls at Scutari. Repeated assurances have also been obtained by our envoy at Constantinople that similar institutions maintained and administered by our countrymen shall be secured in the enjoyment of all rights, and that our citizens throughout the Empire shall be protected.

The Government, however, in view of existing facts, is far from relying upon such assurances as the limit of its duty. Our minister has been vigilant and alert in affording all possible protection in individual cases where danger threatened or safety was imperiled. We have sent ships as far toward the points of actual disturbance as it is possible for them to go, where they offer refuge to those obliged to flee, and we have the promise of other powers which have ships in the neighborhood that our citizens, as well as theirs, will be received and protected on board those ships. On the demand of our minister, orders have been issued by the Sultan that Turkish soldiers shall guard and escort to the coast American refugees.

These orders have been carried out, and our latest intelligence gives assurance of the present personal safety of our citizens and missionaries. Though thus far no lives of American citizens have been sacrificed, there can be no doubt that serious loss and destruction of mission property have resulted from riotous conflicts and outrageous attacks.

By treaty several of the most powerful European powers have secured a right and have assumed a duty not only in behalf of their own citizens and in furtherance of their own interests, but as agents of the Christian world. Their right is to enforce such conduct of Turkish government as will restrain fanatical brutality, and if this fails their duty is to so interfere as to insure against such dreadful occurrences in Turkey as have lately shocked civilization. The powers declare this right and this duty to be theirs alone, and it is earnestly hoped that prompt and effective action on their part will not be delayed.

The new consulates at Erzerum and Harpoot, for which appropriation was made last session, have been provisionally filled by trusted employees of the Department of State. These appointees, though now in Turkey, have not yet received their exequaturs.

The arbitration of the claim of the Venezuela Steam Transportation Company under the treaty of January 19, 1892, between the United States and Venezuela, resulted in an award in favor of the claimant.

The Government has used its good offices toward composing the differences between Venezuela on the one hand and France and Belgium on the other, growing out of the dismissal of the representatives of those powers on the ground of a publication deemed offensive to Venezuela. Although that dismissal was coupled with a cordial request that other more personally agreeable envoys be sent in their stead, a rupture of intercourse ensued, and still continues.

In view of the growth of our interests in foreign countries and the encouraging prospects for a general expansion of our commerce, the question of an improvement in the consular service has increased in importance and urgency. Though there is no doubt that the great body of consular officers are rendering valuable services to the trade and industries of the country, the need of some plan of appointment and control which would tend to secure a higher average of efficiency can not be denied.

The importance of the subject has led the Executive to consider what steps might properly be taken without additional legislation to answer the need of a better system of consular appointments. The matter having been committed to the consideration of the Secretary of State, in pursuance of his recommendations an Executive order was issued on the 20th of September, 1895, by the terms of which it is provided that after that date any vacancy in a consulate or commercial agency with an annual salary or compensation from official fees of not more than $2,500 or less than $1,000 should be filled either by transfer or promotion from some other position under the Department of State of a character tending to qualify the incumbent for the position to be filled, or by the appointment of a person not under the Department of State, but having previously served thereunder and shown his capacity and fitness for consular duty, or by the appointment of a person who, having been selected by the President and sent to a board for examination, is found, upon such examination, to be qualified for the position. Posts which pay less than $1,000 being usually, on account of their small compensation, filled by selection from residents of the locality, it was not deemed practicable to put them under the new system.

The compensation of $2,500 was adopted as the maximum limit in the classification for the reason that consular officers receiving more than that sum are often charged with functions and duties scarcely inferior in dignity and importance to those of diplomatic agents, and it was therefore thought best to continue their selection in the discretion of the Executive without subjecting them to examination before a board. Excluding seventy-one places with compensation at present less than $1,000, and fifty-three places above the maximum in compensation, the number of positions remaining within the scope of the order is one hundred and ninety-six. This number will undoubtedly be increased by the inclusion of consular officers whose remuneration in fees, now less than $1,000, will be augmented with the growth of our foreign commerce and a return to more favorable business conditions.

In execution of the Executive order referred to, the Secretary of State has designated as a board to conduct the prescribed examinations the Third Assistant Secretary of State, the Solicitor of the Department of State, and the Chief of the Consular Bureau, and has specified the subjects to which such examinations shall relate.

It is not assumed that this system will prove a full measure of consular reform. It is quite probable that actual experience will show particulars in which the order already issued may be amended, and demonstrate that, for the best results, appropriate legislation by Congress is imperatively required.

In any event these efforts to improve the consular service ought to be immediately supplemented by legislation providing for consular inspection. This has frequently been a subject of Executive recommendation, and I again urge such action by Congress as will permit the frequent and thorough inspection of consulates by officers appointed for that purpose or by persons already in the diplomatic or consular service. The expense attending such a plan would be insignificant compared with its usefulness, and I hope the legislation necessary to set it on foot will be speedily forthcoming.

I am thoroughly convinced that in addition to their salaries our ambassadors and ministers at foreign courts should be provided by the Government with official residences. The salaries of these officers are comparatively small and in most cases insufficient to pay, with other necessary expenses, the cost of maintaining household establishments in keeping with their important and delicate functions. The usefulness of a nation's diplomatic representative undeniably depends much upon the appropriateness of his surroundings, and a country like ours, while avoiding unnecessary glitter and show, should be certain that it does not suffer in its relations with foreign nations through parsimony and shabbiness in its diplomatic outfit. These considerations and the other advantages of having fixed and somewhat permanent locations for our embassies would abundantly justify the moderate expenditure necessary to carry out this suggestion.

As we turn from a review of our foreign relations to the contemplation of our national financial situation we are immediately aware that we approach a subject of domestic concern more important than any other that can engage our attention, and one at present in such a perplexing and delicate predicament as to require prompt and wise treatment.

We may well be encouraged to earnest effort in this direction when we recall the steps already taken toward improving our economic and financial situation, and when we appreciate how well the way has been prepared for further progress by an aroused and intelligent popular interest in these subjects.

By command of the people a customs-revenue system, designed for the protection and benefit of favored classes at the expense of the great mass of our countrymen, and which, while inefficient for the purpose of revenue, curtailed our trade relations and impeded our entrance to the markets of the world, has been superseded by a tariff policy which in principle is based upon a denial of the right of the Government to obstruct the avenues to our people's cheap living, or lessen their comfort and contentment, for the sake of according especial advantages to favorites, and which, while encouraging our intercourse and trade with other nations, recognizes the fact that American self-reliance, thrift, and ingenuity can build up our country's industries and develop its resources more surely than enervating paternalism.

The compulsory purchase and coinage of silver by the Government, unchecked and unregulated by business conditions and heedless of our currency needs, which for more than fifteen years diluted our circulating medium, undermined confidence abroad in our financial ability, and at last culminated in distress and panic at home, has been recently stopped by the repeal of the laws which forced this reckless scheme upon the country.

The things thus accomplished, notwithstanding their extreme importance and beneficent effects, fall far short of curing the monetary evils from which we suffer as a result of long indulgence in ill-advised financial expedients.

The currency denominated United States notes and commonly known as greenbacks was issued in large volume during the late civil war, and was intended originally to meet the exigencies of that period. It will be seen by a reference to the debates in Congress at the time the laws were passed authorizing the issue of these notes that their advocates declared they were intended for only temporary use and to meet the emergency of war. In almost if not all the laws relating to them some provision was made contemplating their voluntary or compulsory retirement. A large quantity of them, however, were kept on foot and mingled with the currency of the country, so that at the close of the year 1874 they amounted to $381,999,073.

Immediately after that date, and in January, 1875, a law was passed providing for the resumption of specie payments, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was required, whenever additional circulation was issued to national banks, to retire United States notes equal in amount to 80 per cent of such additional national-bank circulation until such notes were reduced to $300,000,000. This law further provided that on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the United States notes then outstanding should be redeemed in coin, and in order to provide and prepare for such redemption the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized not only to use any surplus revenues of the Government, but to issue bonds of the United States and dispose of them for coin, and to use the proceeds for the purposes contemplated by the statute.

In May, 1878, and before the date thus appointed for the redemption and retirement of these notes, another statute was passed forbidding their further cancellation and retirement. Some of them had, however, been previously redeemed and canceled upon the issue of additional national-bank circulation, as permitted by the law of 1875, so that the amount outstanding at the time of the passage of the act forbidding their further retirement was $346,681,016.

The law of 1878 did not stop at distinct prohibition, but contained, in addition, the following express provision:

"And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury, under any law, from any source whatever, and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation."

This was the condition of affairs on the 1st day of January, 1879, which had been fixed upon four years before as the date for entering upon the redemption and retirement of all these notes, and for which such abundant means had been provided.

The Government was put in the anomalous situation of owing to the holders of its notes debts payable in gold on demand which could neither be retired by receiving such notes in discharge of obligations due the Government nor canceled by actual payment in gold. It was forced to redeem without redemption and to pay without acquittance.

There had been issued and sold $95,500,000 of the bonds authorized by the resumption act of 1875, the proceeds of which, together with other gold in the Treasury, created a gold fund deemed sufficient to meet the demands which might be made upon it for the redemption of the outstanding United States notes. This fund, together with such other gold as might be from time to time in the Treasury available for the same purpose, has been since called our gold reserve, and $100,000,000 has been regarded as an adequate amount to accomplish its object. This fund amounted on the 1st day of January, 1879, to $114,193,360, and though thereafter constantly fluctuating, it did not fall below that sum until July, 1892. In April, 1893, for the first time since its establishment, this reserve amounted to less than $100,000,000, containing at that date only $97,011,330.

In the meantime, and in July, 1890, an act had been passed directing larger governmental monthly purchases of silver than had been required under previous laws, and providing that in payment for such silver Treasury notes of the United States should be issued payable on demand in gold or silver coin at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. It was, however, declared in the act to be "the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such ratio as may be provided by law." In view of this declaration it was not deemed permissible for the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise the discretion in terms conferred on him, by refusing to pay gold on these notes when demanded, because by such discrimination in favor of the gold dollar the so-called parity of the two metals would be destroyed, and grave and dangerous consequences would be precipitated by affirming or accentuating the constantly widening disparity between their actual values under the existing ratio.

It thus resulted that the Treasury notes issued in payment of silver purchases under the law of 1890 were necessarily treated as gold obligations, at the option of the holder. These notes on the 1st day of November, 1893, when the law compelling the monthly purchase of silver was repealed, amounted to more than $155,000,000. The notes of this description now outstanding added to the United States notes still undiminished by redemption or cancellation constitute a volume of gold obligations amounting to nearly $500,000,000. These obligations are the instruments which, ever since we have had a gold reserve, have been used to deplete it.

This reserve, as has been stated, had fallen in April, 1893, to $97,011,330. It has from that time to the present, with very few and unimportant upward movements, steadily decreased, except as it has been temporarily replenished by the sale of bonds.

Among the causes for this constant and uniform shrinkage in this fund may be mentioned the great falling off of exports under the operation of the tariff law until recently in force, which crippled our exchange of commodities with foreign nations and necessitated to some extent the payment of our balances in gold; the unnatural infusion of silver into our currency, and the increasing agitation for its free and unlimited coinage, which have created apprehension as to our disposition or ability to continue gold payments; the consequent hoarding of gold at home and the stoppage of investments of foreign capital, as well as the return of our securities already sold abroad; and the high rate of foreign exchange, which induced the shipment of our gold to be drawn against, as a matter of speculation.

In consequence of these conditions the gold reserve on the 1st day of February, 1894, was reduced to $65,438,377, having lost more than $31,000,000 during the preceding nine months, or since April, 1893. Its replenishment being necessary, and no other manner of accomplishing it being possible, resort was had to the issue and sale of bonds provided for by the resumption act of 1875. Fifty millions of these bonds were sold, yielding $58,633,295.71, which was added to the reserve fund of gold then on hand. As a result of this operation this reserve, which had suffered constant and large withdrawals in the meantime, stood on the 6th day of March, 1894, at the sum of $107,446,802. Its depletion was, however, immediately thereafter so accelerated that on the 30th day of June, 1894, it had fallen to $64,873,025, thus losing by withdrawals more than $42,000,000 in five months and dropping slightly below its situation when the sale of $50,000,000 in bonds was effected for its replenishment.

This depressed condition grew worse, and on the 24th day of November, 1894, our gold reserve being reduced to $57,669,701, it became necessary to again strengthen it. This was done by another sale of bonds amounting to $50,000,000, from which there was realized $58,538.500, with which the fund was increased to $111,142,021 on the 4th day of December, 1894.

Again disappointment awaited the anxious hope for relief. There was not even a lull in the exasperating withdrawals of gold. On the contrary, they grew larger and more persistent than ever. Between the 4th day of December, 1894, and early in February, 1895, a period of scarcely more than two months after the second reenforcement of our gold reserve by the sale of bonds, it had lost by such withdrawals more than $69,000,000, and had fallen to $41,340,181. Nearly $43,000,000 had been withdrawn within the month immediately preceding this situation.

In anticipation of impending trouble, I had on the 28th day of January, 1895, addressed a communication to the Congress fully setting forth our difficulties and dangerous position, and earnestly recommending that authority be given the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds bearing a low rate of interest, payable by their terms in gold, for the purpose of maintaining a sufficient gold reserve, and also for the redemption and cancellation of outstanding United States notes and the Treasury notes issued for the purchase of silver under the law of 1890. This recommendation did not, however, meet with legislative approval.

In February, 1895, therefore, the situation was exceedingly critical. With a reserve perilously low and a refusal of Congressional aid, everything indicated that the end of gold payments by the Government was imminent. The results of prior bond issues had been exceedingly unsatisfactory, and the large withdrawals of gold immediately succeeding their public sale in open market gave rise to a reasonable suspicion that a large part of the gold paid into the Treasury upon such sales was promptly drawn out again by the presentation of United States notes or Treasury notes and found its way to the hands of those who had only temporarily parted with it in the purchase of bonds.

In this emergency, and in view of its surrounding perplexities, it became entirely apparent to those upon whom the struggle for safety was devolved not only that our gold reserve must, for the third time in less than thirteen months, be restored by another issue and sale of bonds bearing a high rate of interest and badly suited to the purpose, but that a plan must be adopted for their disposition promising better results than those realized on previous sales. An agreement was therefore made with a number of financiers and bankers whereby it was stipulated that bonds described in the resumption act of 1875, payable in coin thirty years after their date, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and amounting to about $62,000,000, should be exchanged for gold, receivable by weight, amounting to a little more than $65,000,000.

This gold was to be delivered in such installments as would complete its delivery within about six months from the date of the contract, and at least one-half of the amount was to be furnished from abroad. It was also agreed by those supplying this gold that during the continuance of the contract they would by every means in their power protect the Government against gold withdrawals. The contract also provided that if Congress would authorize their issue, bonds payable by their terms in gold and bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum might within ten days be substituted at par for the 4 per cent bonds described in the agreement.

On the day this contract was made its terms were communicated to Congress by a special Executive message, in which it was stated that more than sixteen millions of dollars would be saved to the Government if gold bonds bearing 3 per cent interest were authorized to be substituted for those mentioned in the contract.

The Congress having declined to grant the necessary authority to secure this saving, the contract, unmodified, was carried out, resulting in a gold reserve amounting to $107,571,230 on the 8th day of July, 1895. The performance of this contract not only restored the reserve, but checked for a time the withdrawals of gold and brought on a period of restored confidence and such peace and quiet in business circles as were of the greatest possible value to every interest that affects our people. I have never had the slightest misgiving concerning the wisdom or propriety of this arrangement, and am quite willing to answer for my full share of responsibility for its promotion. I believe it averted a disaster the imminence of which was, fortunately, not at the time generally understood by our people.

Though the contract mentioned stayed for a time the tide of gold withdrawal, its good results could not be permanent. Recent withdrawals have reduced the reserve from $107,571,230 on the 8th day of July, 1895, to $79,333,966. How long it will remain large enough to render its increase unnecessary is only matter of conjecture, though quite large withdrawals for shipment in the immediate future are predicted in well-informed quarters. About $16,000,000 has been withdrawn during the month of November.

The foregoing statement of events and conditions develops the fact that after increasing our interest-bearing bonded indebtedness more than $162,000,000 to save our gold reserve we are nearly where we started, having now in such reserve $79,333,966, as against $65,438,377 in February, 1894, when the first bonds were issued.

Though the amount of gold drawn from the Treasury appears to be very large, as gathered from the facts and figures herein presented, it actually was much larger, considerable sums having been acquired by the Treasury within the several periods stated without the issue of bonds. On the 28th of January, 1895, it was reported by the Secretary of the Treasury that more than $172,000,000 of gold had been withdrawn for hoarding or shipment during the year preceding. He now reports that from January 1, 1879, to July 14, 1890, a period of more than eleven years, only a little over $28,000,000 was withdrawn, and that between July 14, 1890, the date of the passage of the law for an increased purchase of silver, and the 1st day of December, 1895, or within less than five and a half years, there was withdrawn nearly $375,000,000, making a total of more than $403,000,000 drawn from the Treasury in gold since January 1, 1879, the date fixed in 1875 for the retirement of the United States notes.

Nearly $327,000,000 of the gold thus withdrawn has been paid out on these United States notes; and yet every one of the $346,000,000 is still uncanceled and ready to do service in future gold depletions.

More than $76,000,000 in gold has, since their creation in 1890, been paid out from the Treasury upon the notes given on the purchase of silver by the Government; and yet the whole, amounting to $155,000,000, except a little more than $16,000,000, which have been retired by exchanges for silver at the request of the holders, remains outstanding and prepared to join their older and more experienced allies in future raids upon the Treasury's gold reserve.

In other words, the Government has paid in gold more than nine-tenths of its United States notes and still owes them all. It has paid in gold about one-half of its notes given for silver purchases without extinguishing by such payment one dollar of these notes.

When added to all this we are reminded that to carry on this astounding financial scheme the Government has incurred a bonded indebtedness of $95,500,000 in establishing a gold reserve, and of $162,315,400 in efforts to maintain it; that the annual interest charged on such bonded indebtedness is more than $11,000,000; that a continuance in our present course may result in further bond issues, and that we have suffered or are threatened with all this for the sake of supplying gold for foreign shipment or facilitating its hoarding at home, a situation is exhibited which certainly ought to arrest attention and provoke immediate legislative relief.

I am convinced the only thorough and practicable remedy for our troubles is found in the retirement and cancellation of our United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and the outstanding Treasury notes issued by the Government in payment of silver purchases under the act of 1890.

I believe this could be quite readily accomplished by the exchange of these notes for United States bonds of small as well as large denominations, bearing a low rate of interest. They should be long-term bonds, thus increasing their desirability as investments, and because their payment could be well postponed to a period far removed from present financial burdens and perplexities, when with increased prosperity and resources they would be more easily met.

To further insure the cancellation of these notes and also provide a way by which gold may be added to our currency in lieu of them, a feature in the plan should be an authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of the bonds abroad for gold if necessary to complete the contemplated redemption and cancellation, permitting him to use the proceeds of such bonds to take up and cancel any of the notes that may be in the Treasury or that may be received by the Government on any account.

The increase of our bonded debt involved in this plan would be amply compensated by renewed activity and enterprise in all business circles, the restored confidence at home, the reinstated faith in our monetary strength abroad, and the stimulation of every interest and industry that would follow the cancellation of the gold-demand obligations now afflicting us. In any event the bonds proposed would stand for the extinguishment of a troublesome indebtedness, while in the path we now follow there lurks the menace of unending bonds, with our indebtedness still undischarged and aggravated in every feature. The obligations necessary to fund this indebtedness would not equal in amount those from which we have been relieved since 1884 by anticipation and payment, beyond the requirements of the sinking fund, out of our surplus revenues.

The currency withdrawn by the retirement of the United States notes and Treasury notes, amounting to probably less than $486,000,000, might be supplied by such gold as would be used on their retirement or by an increase in the circulation of our national banks. Though the aggregate capital of those now in existence amounts to more than $664,000,000, their outstanding circulation based on bond security amounts to only about $190,000,000. They are authorized to issue notes amounting to 90 per cent of the bonds deposited to secure their circulation, but in no event beyond the amount of their capital stock, and they are obliged to pay 1 per cent tax on the circulation they issue.

I think they should be allowed to issue circulation equal to the par value of the bonds they deposit to secure it, and that the tax on their circulation should be reduced to one-fourth of 1 per cent, which would undoubtedly meet all the expense the Government incurs on their account. In addition they should be allowed to substitute or deposit in lieu of the bonds now required as security for their circulation those which would be issued for the purpose of retiring the United States notes and Treasury notes.

The banks already existing, if they desired to avail themselves of the provisions of law thus modified, could issue circulation in addition to that already outstanding, amounting to $478,000,000, which would nearly or quite equal the currency proposed to be canceled. At any rate, I should confidently expect to see the existing national banks or others to be organized avail themselves of the proposed encouragements to issue circulation and promptly fill any vacuum and supply every currency need.

It has always seemed to me that the provisions of law regarding the capital of national banks which operate as a limitation to their location fails to make proper compensation for the suppression of State banks, which came near to the people in all sections of the country and readily furnished them with banking accommodations and facilities. Any inconvenience or embarrassment arising from these restrictions on the location of national banks might well be remedied by better adapting the present system to the creation of banks in smaller communities or by permitting banks of large capital to establish branches in such localities as would serve the people—so regulated and restrained as to secure their safe and conservative control and management.

But there might not be the necessity for such an addition to the currency by new issues of bank circulation as at first glance is indicated. If we should be relieved from maintaining a gold reserve under conditions that constitute it the barometer of our solvency, and if our Treasury should no longer be the foolish purveyor of gold for nations abroad or for speculation and hoarding by our citizens at home, I should expect to see gold resume its natural and normal functions in the business affairs of the country and cease to be an object attracting the timid watch of our people and exciting their sensitive imaginations.

I do not overlook the fact that the cancellation of the Treasury notes issued under the silver-purchasing act of 1890 would leave the Treasury in the actual ownership of sufficient silver, including seigniorage, to coin nearly $178,000,000 in standard dollars. It is worthy of consideration whether this might not, from time to time, be converted into dollars or fractional coin and slowly put into circulation, as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury the necessities of the country should require.

Whatever is attempted should be entered upon fully appreciating the fact that by careless, easy descent we have reached a dangerous depth, and that our ascent will not be accomplished without laborious toil and struggle. We shall be wise if we realize that we are financially ill and that our restoration to health may require heroic treatment and unpleasant remedies.

In the present stage of our difficulty it is not easy to understand how the amount of our revenue receipts directly affects it. The important question is not the quantity of money received in revenue payments, but the kind of money we maintain and our ability to continue in sound financial condition. We are considering the Government's holdings of gold as related to the soundness of our money and as affecting our national credit and monetary strength.

If our gold reserve had never been impaired; if no bonds had ever been issued to replenish it; if there had been no fear and timidity concerning our ability to continue gold payments; if any part of our revenues were now paid in gold, and if we could look to our gold receipts as a means of maintaining a safe reserve, the amount of our revenues would be an influential factor in the problem. But unfortunately all the circumstances that might lend weight to this consideration are entirely lacking.

In our present predicament no gold is received by the Government in payment of revenue charges, nor would there be if the revenues were increased. The receipts of the Treasury, when not in silver certificates, consist of United States notes and Treasury notes issued for silver purchases. These forms of money are only useful to the Government in paying its current ordinary expenses, and its quantity in Government possession does not in the least contribute toward giving us that kind of safe financial standing or condition which is built on gold alone.

If it is said that these notes if held by the Government can be used to obtain gold for our reserve, the answer is easy. The people draw gold from the Treasury on demand upon United States notes and Treasury notes, but the proposition that the Treasury can on demand draw gold from the people upon them would be regarded in these days with wonder and amusement. And even if this could be done, there is nothing to prevent those thus parting with their gold from regaining it the next day or the next hour by the presentation of the notes they received in exchange for it.

The Secretary of the Treasury might use such notes taken from a surplus revenue to buy gold in the market. Of course he could not do this without paying a premium. Private holders of gold, unlike the Government, having no parity to maintain, would not be restrained from making the best bargain possible when they furnished gold to the Treasury; but the moment the Secretary of the Treasury bought gold on any terms above par he would establish a general and universal premium upon it, thus breaking down the parity between gold and silver which the Government is pledged to maintain, and opening the way to new and serious complications. In the meantime the premium would not remain stationary, and the absurd spectacle might be presented of a dealer selling gold to the Government, and with United States notes or Treasury notes in his hand immediately clamoring for its return and a resale at a higher premium.

It may be claimed that a large revenue and redundant receipts might favorably affect the situation under discussion by affording an opportunity of retaining these notes in the Treasury when received, and thus preventing their presentation for gold. Such retention to be useful ought to be at least measurably permanent; and this is precisely what is prohibited, so far as United States notes are concerned, by the law of 1878 forbidding their further retirement. That statute in so many words provides that these notes when received into the Treasury and belonging to the United States shall be "paid out again and kept in circulation."

It will, moreover, be readily seen that the Government could not refuse to pay out United States notes and Treasury notes in current transactions when demanded and insist on paying out silver alone and still maintain the parity between that metal and the currency representing gold. Besides, the accumulation in the Treasury of currency of any kind exacted from the people through taxation is justly regarded as an evil, and it can not proceed far without vigorous protest against an unjustifiable retention of money from the business of the country and a denunciation of a scheme of taxation which proves itself to be unjust when it takes from the earnings and income of the citizen money so much in excess of the needs of Government support that large sums can be gathered and kept in the Treasury. Such a condition has heretofore in times of surplus revenue led the Government to restore currency to the people by the purchase of its unmatured bonds at a large premium and by a large increase of its deposits in national banks, and we easily remember that the abuse of Treasury accumulation has furnished a most persuasive argument in favor of legislation radically reducing our tariff taxation.

Perhaps it is supposed that sufficient revenue receipts would in a sentimental way improve the situation, by inspiring confidence in our solvency and allaying the fear of pecuniary exhaustion. And yet through all our struggles to maintain our gold reserve there never has been any apprehension as to our ready ability to pay our way with such money as we had; and the question whether or not our current receipts met our current expenses has not entered into the estimate of our solvency. Of course the general state of our funds, exclusive of gold, was entirely immaterial to the foreign creditor and investor. His debt could only be paid in gold, and his only concern was our ability to keep on hand that kind of money.

On July 1, 1892, more than a year and a half before the first bonds were issued to replenish the gold reserve, there was a net balance in the Treasury, exclusive of such reserve, of less than $13,000,000; but the gold reserve amounted to more than $114,000,000, which was the quieting feature of the situation. It was when the stock of gold began rapidly to fall that fright supervened and our securities held abroad were returned for sale and debts owed abroad were pressed for payment. In the meantime extensive shipments of gold and other unfavorable indications caused restlessness and fright among our people at home. Thereupon the general state of our funds, exclusive of gold, became also immaterial to them, and they, too, drew gold from the Treasury for hoarding against all contingencies. This is plainly shown by the large increase in the proportion of gold withdrawn which was retained by our own people as time and threatening incidents progressed. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, nearly $85,000,000 in gold was withdrawn from the Treasury and about $77,000,000 was sent abroad, while during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, over $117,000,000 was drawn out, of which only about $66,000,000 was shipped, leaving the large balance of such withdrawals to be accounted for by domestic hoarding.

Inasmuch as the withdrawal of our gold has resulted largely from fright, there is nothing apparent that will prevent its continuance or recurrence, with its natural consequences, except such a change in our financial methods as will reassure the frightened and make the desire for gold less intense. It is not clear how an increase in revenue, unless it be in gold, can satisfy those whose only anxiety is to gain gold from the Government's store.

It can not therefore be safe to rely upon increased revenues as a cure for our present troubles.

It is possible that the suggestion of increased revenue as a remedy for the difficulties we are considering may have originated in an intimation or distinct allegation that the bonds which have been issued ostensibly to replenish our gold reserve were really issued to supply insufficient revenue. Nothing can be further from the truth. Bonds were issued to obtain gold for the maintenance of our national credit. As has been shown, the gold thus obtained has been drawn again from the Treasury upon United States notes and Treasury notes. This operation would have been promptly prevented if possible; but these notes having thus been passed to the Treasury, they became the money of the Government, like any other ordinary Government funds, and there was nothing to do but to use them in paying Government expenses when needed.

At no time when bonds have been issued has there been any consideration of the question of paying the expenses of Government with their proceeds. There was no necessity to consider that question. At the time of each bond issue we had a safe surplus in the Treasury for ordinary operations, exclusive of the gold in our reserve. In February, 1894, when the first issue of bonds was made, such surplus amounted to over $18,000,000; in November, when the second issue was made, it amounted to more than $42,000,000, and in February, 1895, when bonds for the third time were issued, such surplus amounted to more than $100,000,000. It now amounts to $98,072,420.30.

Besides all this, the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority whatever to issue bonds to increase the ordinary revenues or pay current expenses.

I can not but think there has been some confusion of ideas regarding the effects of the issue of bonds and the results of the withdrawal of gold. It was the latter process and not the former that by substituting in the Treasury United States notes and Treasury notes for gold increased by their amount the money which was in the first instance subject to ordinary Government expenditure.

Although the law compelling an increased purchase of silver by the Government was passed on the 14th day of July, 1890, withdrawals of gold from the Treasury upon the notes given in payment on such purchases did not begin until October, 1891. Immediately following that date the withdrawals upon both these notes and United States notes increased very largely, and have continued to such an extent that since the passage of that law there has been more than thirteen times as much gold taken out of the Treasury upon United States notes and Treasury notes issued for silver purchases as was thus withdrawn during the eleven and a half years immediately prior thereto and after the 1st day of January, 1879, when specie payments were resumed.

It is neither unfair nor unjust to charge a large share of our present financial perplexities and dangers to the operation of the laws of 1878 and 1890 compelling the purchase of silver by the Government, which not only furnished a new Treasury obligation upon which its gold could be withdrawn, but so increased the fear of an overwhelming flood of silver and a forced descent to silver payments that even the repeal of these laws did not entirely cure the evils of their existence.

While I have endeavored to make a plain statement of the disordered condition of our currency and the present dangers menacing our prosperity, and to suggest a way which leads to a safer financial system, I have constantly had in mind the fact that many of my countrymen, whose sincerity I do not doubt, insist that the cure for the ills now threatening us may be found in the single and simple remedy of the free coinage of silver. They contend that our mints shall be at once thrown open to the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of both gold and silver dollars of full legal-tender quality, regardless of the action of any other Government and in full view of the fact that the ratio between the metals which they suggest calls for 100 cents' worth of gold in the gold dollar at the present standard and only 50 cents in intrinsic worth of silver in the silver dollar.

Were there infinitely stronger reasons than can be adduced for hoping that such action would secure for us a bimetallic currency moving on lines of parity, an experiment so novel and hazardous as that proposed might well stagger those who believe that stability is an imperative condition of sound money.

No government, no human contrivance or act of legislation, has ever been able to hold the two metals together in free coinage at a ratio appreciably different from that which is established in the markets of the world.

Those who believe that our independent free coinage of silver at an artificial ratio with gold of 16 to 1 would restore the parity between the metals, and consequently between the coins, oppose an unsupported and improbable theory to the general belief and practice of other nations, and to the teaching of the wisest statesmen and economists of the world, both in the past and present, and, what is far more conclusive, they run counter to our own actual experiences.

Twice in our earlier history our lawmakers in attempting to establish a bimetallic currency undertook free coinage upon a ratio which accidentally varied from the actual relative values of the two metals not more than 3 per cent. In both cases, notwithstanding greater difficulties and cost of transportation than now exist, the coins whose intrinsic worth was undervalued in the ratio gradually and surely disappeared from our circulation and went to other countries where their real value was better recognized.

Acts of Congress were impotent to create equality where natural causes decreed even a slight inequality.

Twice in our recent history we have signally failed to raise by legislation the value of silver. Under an act of Congress passed in 1878 the Government was required for more than twelve years to expend annually at least $24,000,000 in the purchase of silver bullion for coinage. The act of July 14, 1890, in a still bolder effort increased the amount of silver the Government was compelled to purchase, and forced it to become the buyer annually of 54,000,000 ounces, or practically the entire product of our mines. Under both laws silver rapidly and steadily declined in value. The prophecy and the expressed hope and expectation of those in the Congress who led in the passage of the last-mentioned act, that it would reestablish and maintain the former parity between the two metals, are still fresh in our memory.

In the light of these experiences, which accord with the experiences of other nations, there is certainly no secure ground for the belief that an act of Congress could now bridge an inequality of 50 per cent between gold and silver at our present ratio, nor is there the least possibility that our country, which has less than one-seventh of the silver money in the world, could by its action alone raise not only our own, but all silver to its lost ratio with gold. Our attempt to accomplish this by the free coinage of silver at a ratio differing widely from actual relative values would be the signal for the complete departure of gold from our circulation, the immediate and large contraction of our circulating medium, and a shrinkage in the real value and monetary efficiency of all other forms of currency as they settled to the level of silver monometallism. Everyone who receives a fixed salary and every worker for wages would find the dollar in his hand ruthlessly scaled down to the point of bitter disappointment if not to pinching privation.

A change in our standard to silver monometallism would also bring on a collapse of the entire system of credit which, when based on a standard which is recognized and adopted by the world of business, is many times more potent and useful than the entire volume of currency and is safely capable of almost indefinite expansion to meet the growth of trade and enterprise. In a self-invited struggle through darkness and uncertainty our humiliation would be increased by the consciousness that we had parted company with all the enlightened and progressive nations of the world, and were desperately and hopelessly striving to meet the stress of modern commerce and competition with a debased and unsuitable currency, and in association with the few weak and laggard nations which have silver alone as their standard of value.

All history warns us against rash experiments which threaten violent changes in our monetary standard and the degradation of our currency. The past is full of lessons teaching not only the economic dangers, but the national immorality that follows in the train of such experiments. I will not believe that the American people can be persuaded after sober deliberation to jeopardize their nation's prestige and proud standing by encouraging financial nostrums, nor that they will yield to the false allurements of cheap money, when they realize that it must result in the weakening of that financial integrity and rectitude which thus far in our history has been so devotedly cherished as one of the traits of true Americanism.

Our country's indebtedness, whether owing by the Government or existing between individuals, has been contracted with reference to our present standard. To decree by act of Congress that these debts shall be payable in less valuable dollars than those within the contemplation and intention of the parties when contracted would operate to transfer, by the fiat of law and without compensation, an amount of property and a volume of rights and interests almost incalculable.

Those who advocate a blind and headlong plunge to free coinage in the name of bimetallism and professing the belief, contrary to all experience, that we could thus establish a double standard and a concurrent circulation of both metals in our coinage, are certainly reckoning from a cloudy standpoint. Our present standard of value is the standard of the civilized world and permits the only bimetallism now possible, or at least that is within the independent reach of any single nation, however powerful that nation may be. While the value of gold as a standard is steadied by almost universal commercial and business use, it does not despise silver nor seek its banishment. Wherever this standard is maintained there is at its side in free and unquestioned circulation a volume of silver currency sometimes equaling and sometimes even exceeding it in amount, both maintained at a parity notwithstanding a depreciation or fluctuation in the intrinsic value of silver.

There is a vast difference between a standard of value and a currency for monetary use. The standard must necessarily be fixed and certain. The currency may be in divers forms and of various kinds. No silver-standard country has a gold currency in circulation; but an enlightened and wise system of finance secures the benefits of both gold and silver as currency and circulating medium by keeping the standard stable and all other currency at par with it. Such a system and such a standard also gives free scope for the use and expansion of safe and conservative credit, so indispensable to broad and growing commercial transactions and so well substituted for the actual use of money. If a fixed and stable standard is maintained such as the magnitude and safety of our commercial transactions and business require, the use of money itself is conveniently minimized.

Every dollar of fixed and stable value has through the agency of confident credit and astonishing capacity of multiplying itself in financial work. Every unstable and fluctuating dollar fails as a basis of credit, and in its use begets gambling speculation and undermines the foundations of honest enterprise.

I have ventured to express myself on this subject with earnestness and plainness of speech because I can not rid myself of the belief that there lurks in the proposition for the free coinage of silver, so strongly approved and so enthusiastically advocated by a multitude of my countrymen, a serious menace to our prosperity and an insidious temptation of our people to wander from the allegiance they owe to public and private integrity. It is because I do not distrust the good faith and sincerity of those who press this scheme that I have imperfectly, but with zeal submitted my thoughts upon this momentous subject. I can not refrain from begging them to reexamine their views and beliefs in the light of patriotic reason and familiar experience, and to weigh again and again the consequences of such legislation as their efforts have invited. Even the continued agitation of the subject adds greatly to the difficulties of a dangerous financial situation already forced upon us.

In conclusion, I especially entreat the people's representatives in the Congress, who are charged with the responsibility of inaugurating measures for the safety and prosperity of our common country, to promptly and effectively consider the ills of our critical financial plight. I have suggested a remedy which my judgment approves. I desire, however, to assure the Congress that I am prepared to cooperate with them in perfecting any other measure promising thorough and practical relief, and that I will gladly labor with them in every patriotic endeavor to further the interests and guard the welfare of our countrymen whom in our respective places of duty we have undertaken to serve.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 2, 1895.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the message lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution of the legislature of the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, In Assembly, Albany, February 15, 1895.

Whereas from published reports of the stranding of the schooners John V. Manning and Louis V. Place, on the coast of Long Island, between the Lone Hill and the Blue Point life-saving stations, during the terrible storm of wind and snow which swept over the country through the night of February 7 and the day of February 8, it is made entirely clear that the rescue of the crew of the former vessel and of the two survivors of the crew of the latter vessel was effected by the brave men of the above-named stations only through the exercise by them of the highest qualities of human endurance, energy, skill, and dauntless devotion to duty; and

Whereas the tribute of popular esteem and applause is due to such self-sacrificing heroism in the cause of our common humanity: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the legislature of the State of New York feels a proper pride in recognizing such noble deeds on the part of its citizens, and does hereby extend the thanks of the people of this State to Captains Baker and Rourke and their gallant crews of the Lone Hill and Blue Point stations for the service they rendered not only to the immediate subjects of their courage and skill, but also to the whole "brotherhood of man," when for over forty hours of continuous effort, without rest or sleep, night and day, they labored through gloom and gale and bitter frost to save human lives, and when at midnight of February 9 they launched a lifeboat into an ice-covered sea and at the peril of their own lives pushed off to snatch from the jaws of death two seemingly doomed victims of the storm. Such a service belongs to humanity and deserves universal admiration.

Resolved (if the senate concur), That an engrossed copy of these resolutions be sent to each person named therein, properly attested by the president and clerk of the senate and the speaker and clerk of the assembly; and also to the United States Senate and House of Representatives at Washington.

By order of the assembly.

HAMILTON FISH, Speaker.
A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

IN SENATE, February 18, 1895.

Concurred in without amendment.
By order of the senate.

CHARLES T. SAXTON, President.
JNO. S. KENYON, Clerk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Chicago and Quincy, in the State of Illinois; a petition of sundry citizens of Hobart, N. Y.; a petition of sundry citizens of Portland, Oreg., and a petition of the Ministerial Association of Harrisburg, Pa., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Evanston, Ill., in relation to the deplorable condition existing in Turkey, and calling upon our Government to do everything in its power to save life, and in favor of those institutions of Christian civilization that make for peace, liberty, and religious toleration. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Sangamon County, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made to build a substantial, permanent roadway from the city of Springfield, in the State of Illinois, to Camp Butler, a national cemetery in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition in the shape of resolutions adopted by the Methodist Episcopal Church of Marlboro, N. H., signed by George W. Buzzell, pastor, praying that the Armenian wrongs be immediately and permanently righted; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the selectmen and 350 other citizens of Marblehead, Mass., praying that an appropriation be made to build a sea wall for the protection of Marblehead Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Rev. Charles H. Oliphant and other citizens of Methuen, Mass., and the petition of Rev. Professor Smyth, of the Andover (Mass.) Theological Seminary, and other citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the immediate establishment of United States consulates in the Armenian centers, and that every proper effort be made by the Government for the protection of the Christian population of Turkey; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DUBOIS. I present a memorial of the legislature of the State of Idaho, passed after the adjournment of the last Congress, praying for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I ask that the memorial be read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Secretary's Office, State of Idaho:

I, I. W. Garrett, secretary of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of house joint memorial No. 5, which was filed in this office the 5th day of March, A. D. 1895, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at Boise, the capital of Idaho, this 18th day of March, A. D. 1895.
[SEAL.] I. W. GARRETT, Secretary of State.

[House joint memorial No. 5.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent, that the sentiment of the people of the State of Idaho is almost unanimous in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, and we petition your honorable body to submit to the States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which will require the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

The secretary of state is hereby authorized to send certified copies of this memorial to our representatives in Congress.

Passed the house of representatives February 21, 1895.

R. V. COZIER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the senate March 4, 1895.

FREDERICK J. MILLS,
President of the Senate.

Approved this 5th day of March, 1895.

W. J. McCONNELL, Governor.

Mr. DUBOIS presented a memorial of the legislature of the State of Idaho, praying that an appropriation be made for the purpose of removing certain obstructions in Clarks Fork of the Columbia River, near the international boundary line between the United States and British Columbia; which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Secretary's Office, State of Idaho:

I, I. W. Garrett, secretary of the State of Idaho, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and complete transcript of senate joint memorial No. 5, which was filed in this office the 5th day of March, A. D. 1895, and admitted to record.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at Boise, the capital of Idaho, this 18th day of March, A. D. 1895.
[SEAL.] I. W. GARRETT, Secretary of State.

[Senate joint memorial No. 5.—By Browne.—Praying for the removal of certain obstructions existing in the Clarks Fork of the Columbia River.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the senate and house of representatives of the State of Idaho, represent to your honorable body that there now exists in Clarks Fork of the Columbia River, at or near the international boundary line between the United States and British America, certain falls which prevent the access of the Columbia River salmon into the lakes and rivers of northern Idaho and western Montana. We further represent that by the removal of said obstructions these fish would be able to ascend into the large lakes and rivers of a great area of country, embracing all of northern Idaho and western Montana, and that the benefits of the citizens of these States would be very great, not only in furnishing food, but in also making possible the establishment of large canning and fishing industries. For these and other reasons, your memorialists earnestly pray for an appropriation for the purpose of removing those obstructions.

Approved March 5, 1895.

W. J. McCONNELL, Governor.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Lake County, Oreg., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Modoc County, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation giving permission to any person or persons to tap the waters of Goose Lake, in those counties; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of John Thurman, of Portland, Oreg., praying that compensation be granted him for injuries received while employed as a deck hand on the steamboat Corvallis, which was engaged in the improvement of the Cowlitz River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of citizens of Skagit County, in the State of Washington, respectfully showing, by a reference to the map of the State, that the Skagit River is the largest and most important tributary to Puget Sound. The petitioners state that the river is navigable for steamers plying on that sound for a distance of 90 miles from its mouth; and that it is an important stream for national purposes. The petitioners also call attention to the fact that very small appropriations have been made by Congress for improving the Skagit River, whilst large amounts, aggregating over $1,000,000, have been contributed and expended for that purpose by the citizens of Skagit County and for protecting their lands by diking against the waters. They also state that much damage to crops, lands, and timber has been done in this valley by recent floods, estimating their loss at $1,000,000; and they pray that sufficient appropriations be made for improving the navigation of Puget Sound and its tributaries, and that the appropriation for Skagit River be segregated and expended in that work. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I regard it as being worthy of the careful attention of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the Commercial Club, a body of business men, of Tacoma, State of Washington, praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TURPIE. I present the petition of Mrs. Eliza J. Gray, widow of Hon. Isaac P. Gray, deceased, late United States minister to the Republic of Mexico, praying that relief be granted her in consequence of the death of her late husband, which resulted from a severe cold contracted whilst on his way to his post. I move that the petition and accompanying paper be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of the city council of St. Augustine, Fla., and a petition of the city council of Tampa, Fla., praying for the recognition of the government recently organized on the Island of Cuba as a belligerent power in their contest with Spain; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE presented a memorial of the legislature of the State of Maine, praying that the birthday of Abraham Lincoln be made a national holiday; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

STATE OF MAINE:

Whereas a grateful and united nation recognize that Abraham Lincoln was the savior of his country, as Washington was its defender; and

Whereas his exalted leadership as President of the United States through the darkest hours of the nation's life has rendered his name immortal by his distinguished services for union and liberty: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the people of Maine, by its senate and house of representatives in legislature assembled, earnestly ask that, by an act of Congress, the 12th day of February, the birthday of Abraham Lincoln, be made a national holiday.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolves be sent by the secretary of state to each member of our delegation in Congress.

HOUSE, March 19, 1895.

Read and adopted.
Sent up for concurrence.

W. S. COTTON, Clerk.

SENATE, March 20, 1895.

Read and adopted in concurrence.

KENDALL M. DUNBAR, Secretary.

A true copy. Attest:
NICHOLAS FESSENDEN,
Secretary of State.

REPORT ON THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MILLS presented a special report of the Librarian of Congress, made in obedience to a provision of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act passed by the last Congress in March, 1895, requiring the Librarian of Congress to make to the next regular session of Congress a full report touching a complete reorganization of the Library of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2) to provide for the free and unlimited coinage of silver; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3) to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to a portion of the Pyramid Lake Reservation, in Nevada, and to the entire Walker River Reservation, in said State, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4) for the relief of Gen. Napoleon J. T. Dana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5) referring to the Treasury Department the claims of sundry persons for examination, adjustment, and report to Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6) for the relief of P. S. Corbett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 272) to provide for the regulated free coinage of silver bullion into standard dollars of the United States, and for the preservation of the parity of value of the various kinds of coined money of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words, not in the way of making a speech, but merely to ask the attention of the Senate and of the Committee on Finance to the proposition embodied in the bill. It provides for the regulated free coinage of silver bullion, and endeavors to present a method which may afford a solution of the difficulty that confronts all of us, and as to which the differences seem at present to be irreconcilable.

The plan is to provide for the further recognition and use of coined silver as money, to the extent of its production in this country, on what may be deemed a sound and conservative basis, and to provide for the withdrawal of greenbacks from circulation, temporarily at least and under certain conditions, after the greenbacks have been once redeemed; also for the substitution of silver currency for the greenbacks withdrawn, thereby maintaining the same circulation as before their withdrawal; and then, in addition, backing the whole with a moderate gold reserve. Perhaps on further consideration I may wish to change some of the minor features of the bill. At present I venture to submit it as my contribution toward a fair and reasonable settlement of this vexed question, to the end that the money of this country may not be reduced below the needs of its business and people, and that at the same time there may be no apprehension of the suffering of our credit as a people and a nation from what some may think to be too great or too sudden prospective inflation.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 1) relative to the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States deem it proper to assert, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American Continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

Resolved, That we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere; but with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Resolved, That in accordance with the doctrine laid down by President Monroe, as stated in the preceding resolutions, the United States declares that it proposes to maintain the principles embodied in that doctrine and will regard any infringement of it or any attempt on the part of any European power to take or acquire new territory on the American Continent, whether under pretense of boundary disputes or otherwise, as an act of hostility to the United States.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the governments of all nations with whom we have relations of amity and commerce.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 2) providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and certain claims of the State of Tennessee against the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 3) to extend the time for making an assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 4) declaring that a state of public war exists in Cuba, and that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban government; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the Government of the United States recognizes a condition of public war between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and the United States of America hereby declare that they will maintain a condition of strict neutrality between the contending powers and accord to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States; the Congress of the United States protest and remonstrate against the barbarous manner in which the war in Cuba has been conducted, and the President is hereby authorized to take such steps as may be expedient in his judgment to secure an observance of the laws of war as required by all civilized nations.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table. To-morrow morning at the conclusion of the routine business I shall call it up and ask the privilege of submitting some observations upon it. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the request?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Simply that the joint resolution be printed.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all right. I did not understand the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 5) to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers and enlisted men of the various militia organizations of the State of Missouri for horses and equipments lost while engaged in the military service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 6) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of Senators by the votes of the qualified electors of the States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 7) authorizing the issue of duplicate medals where the originals have been lost or destroyed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VEST introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 8) in regard to the export trade in cattle; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Select Committee on the Transportation and Sale of Meat Products.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 9) to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to provide for the election of President and Vice-President by a direct vote of the people, to extend the term to six years, to provide that no person shall hold the office of President more than once, and that a Vice-President shall not be eligible to the office of President; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 10) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of Senators by the people; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 11) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the submission of certain matters to a vote of the people; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 12) to enforce the Monroe doctrine; which was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the policy proclaimed by President Monroe in his message of December 2, 1823, and since known as the Monroe doctrine, is by precedent and tradition the recognized rightful policy of the United States, and that this Government will regard the establishment by any European Power of any new colonial dependency, or of any protectorate over any existing or future Government, or the extension of any territorial possession, or the control or ownership of any interoceanic canal on the Continent of America as a dangerous menace to the welfare and prosperity of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the joint resolution may for the time being lie on the table, and I give notice that to-morrow, if it be agreeable to the Senate, or, if not to-morrow, at some early day thereafter, I shall submit some remarks on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table for the present.

POLICY RESPECTING CUBA, ETC.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate—

1. That the Government of the United States of America should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba, who are now honestly struggling to secure their independence of the Spanish Government, as composing an independent nation and possessing the rights thereof according to the law of nations.

2. That all islands in close proximity to the mainland of the United States of America should, as speedily as possible, by treaties of purchase, be annexed to this Government, as essential to our safety in times of war and the convenience and necessity of our commerce in times of peace.

3. That the wise declaration of President Monroe, known as the Monroe doctrine, is a well-established policy of the Government of the United States, and should be promptly and effectually maintained by the Government in its original purity and purpose.

4. That while the Government of the United States should not needlessly or hastily embroil itself with any foreign power, and should only resort to extreme measures in cases of actual necessity, a firmer and more prompt policy on the part of this Government in maintaining the rights of American citizens abroad should be introduced and pursued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. As several resolutions covering the same subject have been offered and notice has been given, in connection with those resolutions, that Senators would speak on the question, I think the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska had better lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from West Virginia will bear with me, I think I can get out of the road in about ten minutes, and that will give a clear track to-morrow for the other resolutions.

Mr. FAULKNER. Perhaps that would be true if no one desired to discuss the resolution now offered. I think it is better, however, that the resolution should go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over under the rule.

IMPROVEMENT OF CLEARWATER RIVER, IDAHO.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate any information in his possession relating to the improvement of the Clearwater River, Idaho, begun under a project submitted by Maj. J. M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, in 1878, and also to express his opinion and the opinion of the Chief of Engineers as to the advisability of continuing the said improvement until the project adopted by Congress has been completed.

SUITS IN COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I submit a resolution directing the Attorney-General to report certain information in regard to suits pending in the Court of Claims. It is necessary for Congress to have the information, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the number of suits against the United States filed in the Court of Claims and not adjudicated at the commencement of the present term of said court; said report to include the number of suits filed under each separate jurisdiction of said court, namely, under the general jurisdiction, the Bowman and Tucker acts (acts of March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887), the District of Columbia, French spoliations, and Indian depredations; the number of suits heard and determined, or otherwise disposed of under each separate jurisdiction thereof during the last term of said court, and the time it will probably require, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, under present existing legislation and without any increase in the force of his office, to hear, determine, and otherwise dispose of said suits.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. PEFFER submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report an amendment of Rule XXXV so that it shall read substantially as follows:

RULE XXXV.—On request of a standing committee that a particular matter then pending before said committee ought to be considered by the Senate in secret session, the presiding officer shall direct that the galleries be cleared and the doors closed. And all executive sessions of the Senate shall be open, except in cases where the President of the United States shall suggest that the subject-matter of a communication requires secrecy.

FUR-SEAL FISHERY CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the message of the President, received by the Senate on 13th February, 1895, and his message read in the Senate to-day, relating to the payment by the United States of the claims of Great Britain arising out of the Bering Sea controversy, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instruction that said committee examine into the question of such liability to Great Britain, and the amount thereof, if any, and of any liability on the part of Great Britain, or Canada, arising out of said controversy; and that said committee shall have authority to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the resolution lie on the table, and I shall request the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may be heard upon it at the close of the morning hour on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENT AT WILMINGTON, CAL.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate at his earliest convenience whether in his opinion the project for further improvement of the harbor at Wilmington, Cal., proposed by W. H. Benyaurd, lieutenant-colonel, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, on June 8, 1894, and fully set forth in Senate Executive Document No. 61, Fifty-third Congress, third session, can be successfully carried out within the estimates submitted in said report, and to make such recommendation as he may deem advisable with reference thereto.

CENTER MARKET REGULATIONS.

Mr. VEST submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire and report, by bill or otherwise, as to the order recently made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia requiring the small farmers and gardeners who have been allowed spaces on the sidewalk around Center Market, with awnings thereon erected by the Washington Market Company for their accommodation in exposing their market products for sale, to remove their products to a point farther west on the same street and sidewalk.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 4, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 3, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful God, our Heavenly Father, we come into Thy presence with reverence and awe, yet with perfect faith and confidence, because Thou art a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. We thank Thee for that providence which has been over us as a people, to guide and sustain us through all the vicissitudes of the past; and we pray Thee that that same providence shall guide and sustain us through all the future. Let Thy spirit fall mightily upon these Thy servants here assembled, that they may be guided to truth and right and duty. Especially let Thy spirit rest upon the Speaker of this House, that in all his rulings he may be guided in the ways of justice and equity.

Heavenly Father, let peace reign throughout our borders. Yet may we be quick to resent anything like an insult to this our nation. May prosperity smile upon our land, and peace and happiness come into every home. So may Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in Heaven, through Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL, ETC.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. DINGLEY (during the reading). I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the roll of members may be omitted in reading the Journal.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The Journal as read was approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the Representative from the First district of Colorado (Mr. Shafroth), who did not take the oath of office yesterday, is now present. If he will come forward, the oath of office will be administered.

Mr. John F. Shafroth came forward, and was duly qualified by taking the oath of office prescribed by law.

REPORT OF THE RETIRING CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The following is the letter of the retiring Clerk of the House of Representatives, Hon. James Kerr, accompanying his annual report (presented as a part of yesterday's proceedings) showing the receipts and disbursements of the House of Representatives from July 1, 1894, to June 30, 1895, and from July 1, 1895, to December 2, 1895; which report and letter were ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 2, 1895.

SIR: In compliance with the provisions of sections 60, 61, 62, 63, and 70 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the requirements of a resolution of the House of Representatives of July 24, 1868, I have the honor to submit the following reports for the period from July 1, 1894, to June 30, 1895, both days inclusive, and from July 1, 1895, to December 2, 1895, both days inclusive, showing the names of all the clerks and other persons employed, the time they were actually employed, and the sums paid to each (such clerks and other persons having been usefully employed); detailed statements, by items, of the manner in which the contingent fund of the House has been expended, the several amounts drawn from the Treasury, and the balances remaining in my hands, the quantity and cost of all stationery purchased, the amount delivered, that used in the Clerk's office, the stock on hand, and the amount of the unexpended appropriations.

Respectfully submitted.

JAMES KERR,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Hon. THOMAS B. REED,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. PAYNE (appearing at the bar of the House, in company with Mr. CANNON of Illinois and Mr. CRISP) said: Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed by the House, to join a similar committee appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of each of the Houses has assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make, report that they have performed that duty. The President sends to Congress his respectful salutations, and states that he will communicate at once to the two Houses in writing.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the annual message of the President to the Congress of the United States, which the Clerk will read.

The message, which was read by the Clerk of the House, will be found in full in the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that this message of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the usual number of copies be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. How many copies?

Mr. PAYNE. Five thousand, as I understand, is the usual number.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the message just read be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that 5,000 copies be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence, on account of sickness.

ADJOURNMENT TILL FRIDAY.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. PAYNE (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I present the petition of Mr. Henry A. Du Pont, of Delaware, claiming a seat in the Senate for the full term commencing the 4th of March last, by virtue of his election by the legislature of the State of Delaware. I ask that the petition be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned hereby claims the right to be admitted as a Senator from the State of Delaware under an election by the legislature of said State on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, to fill the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and herewith presents evidence in support of his claim.

H. A. DU PONT.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I ask that the petition be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered in the absence of objection.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In support of this claim I present a certificate of the election of Mr. Du Pont, signed by the speaker of the Delaware house of representatives, and attested by the clerk of the house, which I also ask to have read, printed, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

I, Henry H. McMullen, speaker of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware, do hereby certify that on Tuesday, the 15th day of January, A. D. 1895, that being the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the general assembly of the State of Delaware, the senate and house of representatives of the said State respectively proceeded to vote for a Senator in Congress from said State for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895; that at 12 o'clock meridian of the day following the members of the said two houses duly convened in joint assembly, and the journal of each house having been then read, and it appearing therefrom that no person had received a majority of the votes in each house for said office, the said joint assembly did then proceed to vote for a person for Senator, and no person having received on said last-mentioned day a majority of all the votes of the joint assembly, the said joint assembly did meet at 12 o'clock meridian of each succeeding day during the session and did take at least one vote, without any person having received such majority until the 9th day of May of said year, when Henry A. Du Pont received 15 votes, Edward Ridgely received 10 votes, John E. Addicks received 4 votes, and Ebe W. Tunnell received 1 vote; that the general assembly of the State of Delaware theretofore duly elected duly organized on the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895; that the members of the house of representatives of the State of Delaware who were returned as duly elected thereto from the several counties in said State and took their seats therein at the time of the organization thereof as aforesaid were Henry H. McMullen, Frederick Pyle, William Wilson, Francis M. Walker, George W. Reybold, Walter S. Money, and John W. Jolls, representatives from Newcastle County; Horace R. Mustard, William R. Davis, Clarence D. Sypherd, Alexander M. Daly, Ellwood C. Killen, Thomas A. Watson, and Ezekiel Fleming, representatives from Kent County; and John M. Robbins, Newell Ball, Edward S. Burton, George H. Townsend, Charles L. Moore, Horace Brown, and Henry L. Morgan, representatives from Sussex County; that the members of the senate of the State of Delaware who were returned as duly elected thereto from the several counties in said State at the general election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, A. D. 1894, or continued in the office of senator by virtue of their election to said office at the general election held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, A. D. 1892, and who took their seats in said senate at the time of the organization thereof on the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, were Samuel Alrichs, Robert J. Hanby, and John Pyle, senators from Newcastle County; John W. Fenimore, Hezekiah Harrington, and William T. Watson, senators from Kent County, and John M. C. Moore, George F. Pierce, and William T. Records, senators from Sussex County; that all the said senators and representatives, save in so far as hereinafter stated to the contrary, continued to act as senators and members of the house of representatives, respectively, from the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, to the adjournment of the general assembly on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, except during occasional absence, or during the recess or adjournments of the respective houses.

That Joshua H. Marvil was elected governor of the State of Delaware on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1894, and thereafter on the third Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, duly qualified as governor of said State for the term of four years, beginning on the day last aforesaid, and ending on the third Tuesday of January, 1899, and entered upon the exercise of said office of governor; that thereafter on the 8th day of April, A. D. 1895, the said Joshua H. Marvil, while continuing to exercise the office of governor, died; that on the day following, to wit, on the 9th day of April, A. D. 1895, the said William T. Watson, who, upon the organization of the senate, upon the first Tuesday of January, A. D. 1895, had been duly elected and qualified as the speaker of the senate, duly took the oath of office as governor of said State, and thereupon entered upon the exercise of the office of governor of the State of Delaware; that the said William T. Watson during the said session of the general assembly, and until he assumed the office of governor as aforesaid, was and remained the speaker of the senate, and, as such, presided over that body and voted therein, and participated and voted in the sessions aforesaid of the joint assembly of the two houses convened for the purpose of electing a Senator from the State of Delaware in the United States Senate; that upon his qualifying and entering upon the exercise of the office of governor as aforesaid the said William T. Watson ceased to have the right to act as a member of the senate of said State, or to vote in the said joint assembly for the election of a Senator in Congress as aforesaid; that one of the 19 votes so as aforesaid received in said joint assembly on the 9th day of May, A. D. 1895, by Edward Ridgely was then and there given by the said William T. Watson, at that time the governor of the said State; that said vote so given for Edward Ridgely was given by the said William T. Watson illegally, and in violation of the constitution of the State of Delaware, and that Henry A. Du Pont on said ballot having received 15 votes, and Edward Ridgely having received only 9 legal votes, John E. Addicks having received 4 votes, and Ebe W. Tunnell having received 1 vote (no person having theretofore been elected to the office of Senator in Congress from the State of Delaware for said term), the said Henry A. Du Pont having thereby received a majority of the votes of all the senators and representatives then constituting the legislature of the State of Delaware, they being all present and voting, was duly elected Senator in Congress from the State of Delaware for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, A. D. 1895, and was then and there duly declared elected to said office for said term by me as speaker of the house of representatives as aforesaid.

HENRY H. MCMULLEN.
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:
EDGAR T. HASTINGS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In further support of the claim of Mr. Du Pont I submit four documents: First, an affidavit of the clerk of the house of representatives; second, an affidavit of the speaker of the house of representatives; third, an affidavit of Samuel Alrichs, and fourth, a certified copy of the proceedings of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Delaware in joint assembly from January 16 to May 9, 1895, inclusive. I do not ask that any of these documents be read. I ask, however, that they all be printed together, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the papers which have just been ordered printed, with the petition, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. That was my motion, I will state to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not so understand his motion.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly; that was my motion, that all the papers be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order has been made, the Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I ask unanimous consent that Col. Henry A. Du Pont, whose petition has just been presented to the Senate, pending the examination of the papers that bear upon his claim and the question of his right to a seat, be accorded the privileges of the floor of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of J. W. Jackson and sundry other legal voters of Tallapoosa County, Ala., praying that Congress will guarantee a republican form of government to that State. The petition sets out that Alabama does not now have a republican form of government nor ever will have so long as the organized conspirators now in possession of the administrative, executive, and judicial departments of the State government shall be permitted to perpetuate themselves in power by fraud, bribery, and intimidation.

The petitioners set forth that at the general State election in August, 1892, a majority of the legal voters of Alabama cast their ballots for Reuben F. Kolb for governor, but that by fraudulent and corrupt practices on the part of the election inspectors, returning officers, and county boards of supervisors a majority of the votes cast at said election was returned for James G. Jones for governor, and that in like manner a fraudulent legislature of Alabama was secured. They also set out that at the election held in August, 1894, the same fraud took place; that the State ticket headed by Reuben F. Kolb was again elected and the State ticket headed by William C. Oates was defeated, but that by false registration, stuffing the ballot boxes, and other corrupt practices the returns sent in from the different counties made it appear that said Oates had received a majority of about 27,000. They also set forth that a fraudulent legislature was in 1894 set up in the State by means of said corrupt practices, and that this legislature elected a United States Senator.

I also present the petition of M. Thacker and 70 other legal voters of Walker County, Ala., making the same representation and the same prayer;

Also, the petition of V. W. Morris and 70 other legal voters of Walker County, Ala., making the same prayer;

Also, the petition of A. H. Blackwell and 95 other legal voters of Walker County, Ala., making the same prayer;

Also, the petition of William Robbins and 49 other legal voters of Walker County, Ala., making the same prayer;

Also, the petition of W. E. Ivey and 39 other legal voters of Perry County, Ala., making the same prayer;

Also, the petition of E. B. Langley and 31 other legal voters of Tallapoosa County, Ala., to the same effect;

Also, the petition of R. J. Sewell and 70 other legal voters of Tallapoosa County, Ala., to the same effect;

Also, the petition of E. T. Boland and 70 other legal voters of Tallapoosa County, to the same effect;

Also, the petition of Thomas J. Burke and 27 others, of Cullman County, and the petition of P. Hall and 70 others, of Covington County—

All, I have no doubt, legal voters and good citizens of that State, to the same effect.

I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bessemer, Mich., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Andover, Mass., in relation to the atrocities in Armenia; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by the Farmers' National Congress at Atlanta, Ga., praying for the improvement of harbors and the speedy completion of harbors of refuge; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Austin Quimby, president of the Kearsarge Survivors' Association, and 29 others, survivors of the crew of the U. S. S. Kearsarge, praying that certain relics of the Kearsarge be turned over to the remaining survivors; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PEFFER presented the petition of R. B. McCammon and sundry other citizens of Sulphur Springs, Ohio, and the petition of Frank Resch and sundry other citizens of the State of Ohio, praying for the free coinage of silver and remonstrating against the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARK presented a petition of the legislature of the State of Wyoming, praying that the region embraced between townships 42 and 47 north and ranges 113 and 119 west of the sixth principal meridian be set aside as a public park; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 4, of the Third State legislature of Wyoming, has been compared with the original, which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said memorial and of the whole thereof, together with the indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Enrolled joint memorial No. 4, house of representatives, Wyoming.]

Your memorialists, the Third legislature of the State of Wyoming, would respectfully represent:

That the region embraced between townships 42 and 47 north and ranges 113 and 119 west of the sixth principal meridian contains the most noble and inspiring mountain scenery to be found on this continent. It is the Switzerland of America, in which the Matterhorn finds a worthy counterpart in the grand Teton, whose majestic and inaccessible heights are reflected in the clear depths, and whose rugged grandeur is in marvelous contrast to the placid beauty of the mountain lakes which lie at its base. In immediate proximity to the National Park its attractions are of a wholly different character. Together they afford a panorama which in its beauty and diversity of attractions is without a counterpart. The grand Teton is the culmination of this region, the fitting and appropriate landmark of this national pleasure ground.

This region is also the great game preserve of this State and the winter feeding ground of the game which finds a summer home in Yellowstone Park, the greater elevation and heavy snowfall of the latter driving it to the sheltered recesses of this region in winter. If we are to permanently preserve in its native home the nobler wild game of this continent, a winter as well as a summer home must be provided, in which the hand of the hunter can be effectually stayed.

Your memorialists therefore pray that Congress will, by suitable legislation, set this region aside as a public park and pleasure ground, where all can have equal access and enjoyment, and that upon the enactment of proper and adequate legislation by the State of Wyoming for its care and preservation that the ownership of the same be vested in the State.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested upon the approval of this memorial to forward a duly authenticated copy thereof to the Senators and Representative in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of Congress.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 18, A. D. 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 16, 1895.

I hereby certify that the within memorial originated in the house of representatives.

M. C. BARROW, Chief Clerk.

Received from the governor and filed this 19th day of February, 1895.

CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CLARK presented the following memorial of the legislature of Wyoming; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 1 of the Third State legislature of Wyoming has been compared with the original, which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said memorial and of the whole thereof, together with the indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

Secretary of State.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Enrolled memorial No. 1, house of representatives, Wyoming.]

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Third legislature of the State of Wyoming, would most respectfully represent—

That section 8 and section 11 of an act to provide for the admission of Wyoming into the Union, and for other purposes, approved July 10, 1890, provides that certain lands donated to the State by Congress shall not be sold for less than $10 per acre.

An experience of four years in the selection and management of these lands has shown beyond question that such minimum selling price is an unwise and injurious condition. It is unwise because it is arbitrary and has no relation to the actual value of the land it affects. Although a minimum price, it is far above the maximum value of unimproved land in this State. So long as the best lands of this or adjoining States can be had under Federal land laws for a nominal price, it is useless to attempt to secure the occupancy or improvement, much less sale, of State land to which this condition attaches. That this is true is shown by the history of the past four years in which the State has sold only 720 acres out of a total grant of over 3,000,000 acres.

To select land for the State under this condition is to withdraw it from sale and settlement for an indefinite period. It places the State in the position of a speculator in land values. A Commonwealth embracing 63,000,000 acres of land with only 60,000 people is not in a position to profitably engage in such an enterprise. What this State needs above all else is population—people to develop its material resources. It is to the best interest of the State that its lands should be occupied and that they should be disposed of on such terms as to attract instead of prevent immigration. The loss to the State in the selling value of the land bears no comparison to the gain which would come in taxable and productive resources from their early occupancy and use.

Because of these facts, we ask Congress to take early action in the passage of a measure repealing the minimum selling price of land heretofore donated or which may hereafter be donated to this State, and leaving such price to be fixed by the State legislature or the State authorities intrusted with the management and disposal of such lands.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor of the State of Wyoming, be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, upon his approval of this memorial, to forward a duly authenticated copy thereof to the Senators and Representative in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of that body.

Mr. CLARK presented the following memorial of the legislature of Wyoming; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 2 of the Third State legislature of Wyoming has been compared with the original, which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said memorial and of the whole thereof, together with the indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Enrolled memorial No. 2, house of representatives, Wyoming.]

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

Be it resolved by the Third legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America be memorialized as follows:

The Third legislature of the State of Wyoming respectfully represents to the honorable the Senate and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled that they urge the submission of the constitutional amendments now pending in Congress requiring United States Senators to be elected by a vote of the qualified electors of the State.

They believe that the exciting and disturbing contest for seats in the legislature in many of the States has been owing in a great measure to impending contests for United States Senators.

In many States the sessions of the legislature are limited to a specified time, and much of this time has been wasted and consumed in a fruitless effort to elect Senators.

The temptation to corruption and the inducements to influence legislators by questionable means would be entirely removed if the election of Senators were transferred to the people. It is believed the business of the legislature should be confined to matters of legislation, and that the excitement attendant upon the selection of United States Senators by the legislature interferes to a great degree with that business. The growth of public sentiment in this direction we believe to be grounded upon good reasons, calling for an amendment of the Constitution in this respect.

Resolved, That the governor be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested, upon his approval of this memorial, to forward a duly authenticated copy thereof, under the great seal of the State, to the Senators and Representative in Congress from this State, in order that the same may be brought to the attention of the Congress of the United States.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 16, A. D. 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

CHEYENNE, WYO., February 12, 1895.

I hereby certify that the within memorial originated in the house of representatives.

M. C. BARROW, Chief Clerk.

Received from the governor and filed this 16th day of February, 1895.

CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Toledo Produce Exchange and by the common council, of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the erection of a light-house at the lake connection of the harbor of Toledo; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of T. M. Beer and 107 other citizens of Ashland County, Ohio, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of the Commercial Club, a very important organization of business men of the city of Boston, praying for immediate action by the General Government to enlarge and deepen Boston Harbor. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented the petition of Edwin S. Barrett, president of the Massachusetts Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 2720 of the last Congress, to prevent desecration of the national flag; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Connecticut Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 2720 of the last Congress, to prevent desecration of the national flag; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Hon. O. Vincent Coffin, governor of Connecticut, and 30 other citizens of that State, and the petition of Hon. James P. Johnson, mayor of New London, Conn., and 39 other citizens of Connecticut, praying that the United States purchase certain lots adjoining Fort Griswold, in the town of Groton, Conn.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of the city council of West Tampa, Fla., and a petition of the city council of Key West, Fla., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the mayor and council of the city of Olympia, the capital of the State of Washington, in reference to the improvement of the harbor at Olympia, setting forth that of the $275,000 recommended by the Chief of Engineers for the improvement of Olympia Harbor, but $75,000 has been spent, and that there is a provision in the item of appropriation to the effect that the money shall be expended only on a certain part of the harbor. The petition sets forth the desirability of so changing the terms of the appropriation in the future that a portion of the money may be spent to divert the Des Chutes River into its proper channel on the west side of the river. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I present the petitions of 17 patriotic societies of the country praying for the passage of Senate bill 255, which I had the honor of introducing yesterday, to prevent desecration of the national flag. I move that the petitions, together with the publication entitled "The misuse of the national flag of the United States of America" accompanying them, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I present 30 petitions of citizens of Alabama, setting forth that the people of that State are denied a republican form of government, and alleging frauds in the elections of 1892 and 1894 which deprived the then elected governor of his seat, and which had a vital influence upon the Congressional representation of that State in Congress. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I also present resolutions in the form of a petition to Congress adopted by the Populist State convention of Alabama, held at Birmingham, in that State, to the same effect. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY presented the petition of George A. McCall Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, of Westchester, Pa., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Workingmen's Protective Tariff League of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against further internal taxation and praying that additional revenue be secured through increased duties on exports; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GEAR presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition of the chairman and secretary of a large public meeting of citizens of Worcester, Mass., praying for relief against the outrages upon Armenians in Turkey. This petition is so brief and compact that it is difficult to make an abridged statement of its contents under the rule, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The petition is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Recognizing the fact that the influence of your honorable and august body, when exerted on behalf of humanity, has been powerful in securing justice for the oppressed, far-reaching in effect and lasting in results, we, the representatives duly accredited by the mass meeting of the Armenian colony of Worcester, Mass., held on Thanksgiving Day, the 28th of November, 1895, humbly petition that vigorous measures be recommended by you to His Excellency the President of the United States for putting a stop to the most horrible crime of the century—the indiscriminate slaughter and annihilation of Armenian Christians at the hands of the Turkish Government.

In times past the strong, eloquent words of American statesmen, uttered on the floor of the House and Senate, have contributed largely to the peace and liberty of wronged nations beyond the seas.

Though the Sultan has given his tardy and reluctant consent to the reforms demanded by Europe, no hope of benefit can be entertained, as the whole machinery of government is centralized in the palace, and the provincial governors are creatures subservient to the Sultan personally, or else fanatical Moslems, who, instead of repressing disorder and murder, in many cases show an inclination to lead the mob and lend the soldiery to aid in the slaughter of life and the destruction of property.

Based, as Turkish law is, upon the Koran, the Sultan is recognized as the shadow of God on earth, and the impossibility of getting justice for Christians in Moslem courts is self-evident. Disarmed, as we are, resistance on our part is useless, and help must come from without.

The sword of Islam is unsheathed, and unless Europe and America step between fanaticism and its helpless victims, Armenia, once a vineyard, must inevitably become a desert and a tomb. Within a year there have been wantonly murdered at least 50,000 of our people, while hundreds of thousands have been reduced to starvation. Yet the massacres still go on, while the war ships of earth's favored nations swing at anchor in Turkish waters. Blinded by mutual jealousy, the powers of Europe refuse to move.

Therefore, turning our eyes to the United States, we look to Congress for words of encouragement and the warning note that will stay the bloody arm of our oppressors.

We appeal to you, not as aliens, but in the name of ten thousand industrious and law-abiding Armenians, now resident in the United States, and who are rapidly giving it their allegiance.

SARKIS SHAGHALIAN, Chairman.
H. G. ZONIKIAN, Secretary.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 319) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 320) to authorize the construction and operation of an electric railroad within the Yellowstone National Park, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. PRITCHARD introduced a bill (S. 321) granting a pension to James W. Dunn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 322) to secure uniformity in the names of minor streets of the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 323) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 324) to provide for the appointment of a public administrator in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 325) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 326) for the relief of Catherine E. Whitall, which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 327) for the relief of Charles H. Bliss on account of injuries received by the collapse of the building known as Ford's Old Theater on the 9th day of June, 1893; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 328) for the relief of Richard S. Taylor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 329) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of William W. Kerbaugh; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 330) for the relief of James B. Boyd, late a private in Company B, Seventy-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and Battery H, Fourth Regiment United States Artillery; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 331) providing that no person shall be eligible as assignee or receiver of a bankrupt corporation engaged in interstate commerce who shall have been a director, officer, or employee of such corporation at any time during the three years next preceding such bankruptcy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I introduced that bill because it has been sent to me, but not purposing to indorse all its provisions at this moment. I will say, however, that I think there is some ground for giving attention to the subject covered by it. I am in doubt whether it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. If there be no objection, I shall ask to have it referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I think that bill belongs to the Judiciary Committee. It is a bill for the regulation of proceedings in court relative to assignees and receivers of bankrupt corporations engaged in interstate commerce. It seems to me that it would be just as appropriate that a bill providing that a merchant should be dealt with in a certain way in bankruptcy should be referred to the Committee on Commerce, or that a bill providing that a farmer should be dealt with in a certain way should be sent to the Committee on Agriculture, as that this bill should be sent to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I will, however, make no question about it.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought of the view which has been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts in reference to the bill, and therefore I called the attention of the Senate to it before making any direct motion. I called attention to it also for the reason that I think that a committee should inquire into the question whether some legislation is not necessary in that regard. I shall make no objection to the bill going to the Committee on the Judiciary after what has been said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, in the absence of objection.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 332) granting an increase of pension to Philip Kershner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 333) granting an increase of pension to James A. Grimes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROACH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 335) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 336) for the relief of the estate of William B. Todd, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 337) to refer the claim of the owners of the brig Tally-Ho to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 338) for the relief of George F. Roberts, administrator of the estate of William B. Thayer, deceased, surviving partner of Thayer Bros., and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced a bill (S. 339) for the relief of William H. Rhett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BATE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 340) to amend the military record of John H. Skinner; which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 341) granting an increase of pension to Napoleon B. Breedlove; which was read twice by its title. and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 342) to regulate the importation of gunpowder, nitroglycerin, and other explosive substances; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 343) for the relief of George E. Tyson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 345) granting a pension to Catherine R. Jardine, widow of Brig. Gen. Edward Jardine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 346) granting a pension to Kate C. McDougal; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 347) to remove the charge of desertion and grant an honorable discharge to Helmuth F. Sœckel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 348) for relief of Stephen Duncan Marshall and George M. Miller, executors of the will of Levin R. Marshall, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 349) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the bill which I have just introduced is one that was prepared and reported by the joint subcommittee on Naval Affairs of the two Houses at the last Congress, but no action was taken upon it. There are some provisions in the bill which I should modify, and there are some good provisions in it as it now stands. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 350) granting an increase of pension to George C. Abbey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 351) for the relief of Samuel Cole; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 352) granting a pension to Philip Kershner, late lieutenant-colonel of the Sixteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 353) to provide for fixing a uniform standard of classification and grading of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and rye, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also introduced a bill (S. 354) to adjust the pensions of those who have lost limbs or have been totally disabled in them; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 355) granting a pension to Rhoda A. Van Niman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 356) for the erection of a monument to the late Edwin M. Stanton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 357) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint commissioners to estimate damages done to planted oysters and oyster beds in Raritan Bay and adjoining waters in New York and New Jersey, and to make compensation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

He also introduced a bill (S. 358) supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who were incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 359) relating to claims of laborers, workmen, and mechanics, removing the bar of the statute of limitations, and giving the right of appeal in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also introduced a bill (S. 360) for the relief of Northrup & Chick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 362) granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing western branches of the Kansas Agricultural College and of the Kansas State Normal Institute thereon, and for a public park; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 363) granting a pension to Fredaline Glastetter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 364) granting a pension to Perry Harter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COAST DEFENSES.

Mr. SQUIRE. I introduce a bill to provide for the fortifications and other defenses recommended by the board appointed by the President under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act making provisions for fortifications and other works of defense and for the armament thereof for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885, for the ports named in the report of the said board as the ports at which fortifications are most urgently needed, namely: New York, San Francisco, Boston, the lake ports, Hampton Roads, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Portland, Me., Rhode Island ports in Narragansett Bay, Key West, Charleston, S. C., Mobile, New London, Savannah, Galveston, Portland, Oreg., Pensacola, Fla., Wilmington, N. C., San Diego, Cal., Portsmouth, N. H., defenses of Cumberland Sound at Fort Clinch, defenses of ports of the Kennebec River at Fort Popham, New Bedford, Mass., defenses of ports on the Penobscot River, Maine, at Fort Knox, and New Haven, Conn., and, further, for the defense of Puget Sound, and of such other ports as in the judgment of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War may require permanent works of fortification.

Mr. President, I have quoted a part of the terms of this bill because I wish to ask the attention of the Senate and the country to the character and importance of the bill. We are proposing, I understand, to hear discussions of the Monroe doctrine and the importance of maintaining a high stand as to our national honor and the interest of our country relative to the continents of America. We are asked to consider questions relating to the recognition of Cuba and to take a firm stand as to the settlement of the Venezuela boundary dispute by arbitration, the Alaskan boundary contention, and other great international questions affecting the two American continents; and at the same time we seem to go along dreamily, in blissful ignorance or disregard of the fact that we have no adequate protection at our seacoast cities sufficient to withstand the attack of any nation with a respectable navy. Our much-boasted new Navy is probably not more than one-third the size of the new navy of Great Britain. We are talking about these matters as if we were able to carry a chip on our shoulder, so to speak.

I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to the fact that it is needful that there should be immediate legislation on this subject, so that our great seacoast cities may be properly defended, and that we ought to deliberately enter upon a system of protection of the seacoast cities, of which there are, according to the official report, twenty-eight in the United States, besides the lake ports, and only one of them has anything like modern defenses—the port of New York—and that is perhaps not one-tenth of what it ought to be. True, there has been something done at Boston and something done at San Francisco, but the character of the defenses there is still inferior—only a few dynamite guns and a few mortars. There is almost nothing in the way of high-power long-range guns to compete with the great guns of the navies of the world. Not even one of the 16-inch guns recommended has ever yet been built in this country. It will take years and years to construct the necessary guns and the emplacements for them. Even at the rate I propose in this bill nearly twelve years will be required to complete the system. I hope the attention of the Senate will be directed to this matter at a very early date, so that we may obtain legislation. About ten years have already passed since the report of the board. Some time has been required to work out problems, particularly as to disappearing gun carriages and lifts, by which these great guns are quickly depressed to be loaded and elevated to be fired.

I do not think it good policy to longer defer appropriations on a scale comporting with the magnitude of the work. The expenditures should be apportioned fairly among all these different ports, according to the consolidated estimates, and the work should commence as near as may be at the same time at each of them, so that all parts of the United States may have their proportional benefits contemporaneously.

The General Commanding the Army and the Secretary of War concur in calling the attention of Congress to the importance of this matter. Admiral Walker, of the Navy, has expressed similar views, and I have just obtained the advice of the two great bureaus of the War Department concerned—that of Engineers and that of Ordnance—in drawing this bill. Authorities agree that the work should proceed much faster than herein proposed and provided for. But it is better to make haste slowly than to court great danger and risk by feebleness and inaction.

The bill (S. 334) to provide for fortifications and other seacoast defenses was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Senate will support the President in the most vigorous action he may deem fit to take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon such citizens there.

Resolved, That the President be desired to make known to the Government of Turkey the strong feeling of regret and indignation with which the people of America have heard of the injuries inflicted upon persons of the Christian faith in Turkey, and that the American people can not be expected to view with indifference any repetition or continuance of such wrongs.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all information which has been received by him or by the State Department in regard to injuries inflicted upon the persons or property of American citizens in Turkey, and in regard to the condition of affairs there in reference to the oppression or cruelties practiced upon the Armenian subjects of the Turkish Government;

Also to inform the Senate whether all the American consuls in the Turkish Empire are at their posts of duty, and, if not, to state any circumstances which have interfered with the performance of the duties of such consuls.

POLICY RESPECTING CUBA, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. ALLEN was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate—

1. That the Government of the United States of America should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba, who are now honestly struggling to secure their independence of the Spanish Government, as composing an independent nation and possessing the rights thereof according to the law of nations.

2. That all islands in close proximity to the mainland of the United States of America should, as speedily as possible, by treaties of purchase, be annexed to this Government, as essential to our safety in times of war and the convenience and necessity of our commerce in times of peace.

3. That the wise declaration of President Monroe, known as the Monroe doctrine, is a well-established policy of the Government of the United States, and should be promptly and effectually maintained by the Government in its original purity and purpose.

4. That while the Government of the United States should not needlessly or hastily embroil itself with any foreign power, and should only resort to extreme measures in cases of actual necessity, a firmer and more prompt policy on the part of this Government in maintaining the rights of American citizens abroad should be introduced and pursued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the Island of Cuba is but a few hours' ride from the mainland of the United States. It is an island of vast importance, not only from a commercial point of view, but from a strategic point in the event of our becoming involved in war with a foreign power. I am of the number who believe that this Government should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba and assist them in all lawful ways to secure their independence of the Spanish Government and enable them to establish an independent republic. I would not have this Government plunged headlong into a needless quarrel with the Spanish Government, but I would lend every assistance that could be lawfully and properly given to the aspirations of the people of Cuba for a republican form of government. I believe it to be the true policy and the true doctrine of our country that wherever a people show themselves desirous of establishing a republican form of government upon any territory adjacent to us they should receive our encouragement and support. If our form of government is the correct one, and of that I have no doubt, then its recognition or establishment in other lands should be encouraged, and when an opportunity shall present itself to us to lend this encouragement it should be promptly and effectually given.

It is not my purpose to argue at length in support of these resolutions, but I shall content myself at this time in calling attention to them in a general way. I take it for granted that the Island of Cuba is so situated, our commercial relations with it are such, the relations of its people and the Spanish Government are of such a character, as to make it desirable that a republic should be there established. I fully sympathize with the sentiment existing in this country and so frequently expressed by the public press and in conventions and assemblies of our people in favor of the independence of these people.

It may be said that they are not of our race or tongue, but these things should be matters of indifference to us. It ought to be sufficient for us to know that they belong to a race of people who are striving for liberty. They have a desire to abandon the galling yoke of the King and establish a form of government that will be a blessing to them and their posterity through the ages to come, and we should give them such assistance as may be within our power. I believe the time is speedily coming when not only the people of Cuba will be free, but when the people of all the islands of the seas adjacent to this country will have established a republican form of government, or they will have become integral parts of this country. And this leads me, sir, to observe that all islands in close proximity to the mainland of the United States should be as speedily as possible, by treaties of purchase, annexed to our Government, as essential to our safety in times of war and the convenience and necessity of our commerce in times of peace.

No one can seriously doubt that a due regard to the law of self-preservation will require us to take efficient steps in this direction as speedily as we can do so. I do not believe that we should be possessed of greed for territory, or the glories of conquest, but I do believe that the sober, candid, thinking, patriotic people of this country fully realize the necessity of promptly taking steps in this direction to secure our country against foreign invasion and to extend the interests of our commerce.

I believe that a firmer policy should be pursued. I believe that the time has finally come when we should take prompt steps to transfer the carrying trade of this country to American bottoms, rather than to permit British bottoms to carry it, and when the commerce of the United States should be taken into every port of the known world in American-built vessels, and the sails of our ships should whiten every navigable port and water of the earth. I believe more than this. I believe in the wise doctrine of President Monroe, known as the Monroe doctrine. We should insist that it is the established and settled policy of our country, and should insist on its prompt and effectual maintenance in its original purity and purpose. I can not resist the temptation of remarking that in my judgment the people of this country have become dissatisfied with the foreign policy that has been pursued by our Government for the last twenty-five years. I think we all recognize that it has been dilatory, if not absolutely trivial and contemptible in the main. It is true that in a few instances we have bullied inferior powers, as a strong man will sometimes bully a weaker one, while at the same time we have refused to redress the grievances of American citizens.

Mr. President, this beneficent doctrine is in the line of the second of the resolutions which I have had the honor of introducing. It is to the effect that no portion of the territory of this country shall be occupied by a foreign power, and that no such power shall be permitted to advance its territorial possessions on this continent from the line where they rested at the time this great declaration was made. I believe, as an essential part of this doctrine, that we should not only declare that no foreign power should, without the consent of this Government, acquire additional territory on this continent, but that wherever territory is essential to the safety and security of this country we should not only insist that such powers should not acquire additional territory, but we should also insist that this Government shall have the right to such territory by purchase, and that eventually all foreign powers shall be driven from a land that ought to be fully dedicated to the cause of human liberty.

I have said that our foreign policy was tardy and therefore inefficient. In fact, sir, it has been a hiss and a byword among the people of the United States for more than a quarter of a century. I firmly believe that if this Government had acted promptly, and with a spirit of determination had demanded that Mrs. Maybrick, the unfortunate American woman who is now under a life sentence in an English prison, should have been given a fair trial, she would long ago have been afforded an opportunity to make known her innocence of the crime with which she is charged and that she would now be at liberty, or at least be in a position to demand a fair trial before an English jury. So, sir, I believe that the late consul, Waller, who is now languishing in a French prison for the alleged crime of treason to a Government to which he owes no allegiance, would have been set at liberty long ago if prompt steps had been taken by our Government to that end. But we have engaged in lengthy and useless correspondence on this subject with the French Government, and there the matter has ended.

I believe also that this Government should take prompt steps to protect Christians and Christian missionaries in China and Turkey and in all other countries whose Christian population are citizens of this Republic. I do not believe in what is sometimes called "a brilliant foreign policy," but I do believe in a sensible and efficient foreign policy; one that will guarantee to every American citizen when in a foreign land the full measure of his rights, and one that will not permit the country in which he may be sojourning to make him the sport of its whims or the victim of its malice or the malice of its subjects. Such a policy will command the respect of the entire civilized world and will draw to its support American citizens, regardless of political alignment. I desire it to be distinctly understood that I speak for myself alone, and that I do not, by what I here say, undertake to bind in the slightest degree, the political party of which I am a member. I have offered these resolutions that the Senate may act upon them promptly and by their adoption declare to the world that the doctrines they contain are sound and necessary to the welfare of our country; or by rejecting them declare with equal emphasis that the limp and inefficient policy of the past is to be pursued in the future by this Government.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. At the suggestion of several Senators I have consented that the consideration of the joint resolution which I introduced yesterday shall be postponed until to-morrow morning at the conclusion of the routine morning business. At that time I shall ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution, with a view of submitting some observations on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 5, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 5, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting (in compliance with the requirements of an act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, approved May 9, 1888) the claim of James C. Soape, late postmaster at Shreveport, La., for reimbursement for loss resulting from the theft of money and postage stamps from his office April 9, 1890; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by the city council of Jacksonville, Fla., and a petition in the form of resolutions from Nassau Camp, No. 104, United Confederate Veterans, of Fernandina, Fla., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SQUIRE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lewis County, State of Washington, praying for the adoption of a national system of public roads, and indicating a plan to provide for their construction; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented the petition of Robert Williams, sergeant of ordnance, United States Army, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the President to commission him as a second lieutenant of infantry, to be placed on the retired list of the Army with the pay and allowances of that grade; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MANTLE presented a memorial of the legislature of Montana remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue United States bonds at this time and under existing circumstances; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, your memorialists, the Fourth legislative assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent, that

Whereas the President of the United States and other prominent officials of our country have suggested the issuance of a large amount of United States bonds; and

Whereas the country is now in a condition of peace, and the most productive and recuperative nation on earth; and

Whereas believing such issue of bonds would be detrimental to the prosperity of the vast majority of citizens of the country, and would eventually bear especially hard upon the most numerous and poorer class of our people, wherever residing throughout the land, and could only in any event inure to the advantage of the wealthy capitalists and money powers of this country and Europe: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That we sincerely and earnestly protest against the Government of the United States issuing bonds, as has been recommended; and be it

Resolved, That we request the Senators and Member of Congress from this State to use their best efforts and all honorable means to prevent the passage of any act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to issue United States bonds at this time and under existing circumstances.

WILBRA H. SWETT,
Speaker of the House.
ALEX. C. BOTKIN,
President of the Senate.

Attest:
E. W. STETSON, Chief Clerk.

Mr. MANTLE presented the following memorial of the legislature of Montana; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, your memorialists, of the Fourth legislative assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent:

That by law and the proclamation of the President of the United States made October 15, 1892, the homestead-entry settlers upon the then ceded portion of the Crow Reserve are required to pay $1.50 per acre in addition to complying with the other and usual homestead-entry laws, and in addition to paying the other and usual homestead-entry fees; that said tract of land contained within the lately ceded portion of the Crow Reserve is desert land within the meaning of the desert-entry laws; that all of said land requires artificial irrigation to grow agricultural crops successfully; that said irrigation imposes an additional and large burden upon the homestead-entry settlers.

That we know of no good and sufficient reason why the homestead-entry settlers upon this tract should be subject to greater burdens than homestead-entry settlers are in other parts of the United States.

In view of the above facts we respectfully pray that you will abolish said additional charge of $1.50 per acre and allow the homestead-entry settlers upon this tract to obtain title to their lands upon compliance with the same requirements that obtain upon the general law on the subject, thus relieving a large and worthy class of an unjust burden.

For the early consideration of this our memorial we earnestly pray.

WILBRA H. SWETT,
Speaker of the House.
ALEX. C. BOTKIN,
President of the Senate.

Mr. MANTLE presented the following memorial of the legislature of Montana; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We, your memorialists, the Fourth legislative assembly of the State of Montana, respectfully represent:

That within the county of Cascade, in this State, there is now a tract of land known as the Fort Shaw Military Reservation;

That said tract contains about 77 square miles of land, and is situated in the heart of the Sun River Valley, embodying within its limits the best and most valuable agricultural lands in said valley;

That said reservation was abandoned for military purposes by act of Congress about three years back, and subsequently our Indian school was established thereon by the Government.

Further, that under existing conditions this large, valuable tract of land is a barren waste, unoccupied and unproductive.

In view of the above facts we respectfully pray:

1. That you will set apart only so much of said tract as may be sufficient for the purposes of said Indian school—said school land to contain the buildings and appurtenances as now existing—which said school tract is to be continued in its present uses; and,

2. That after such selection for said school the remainder of said Fort Shaw Military Reservation be opened to homestead settlers only under such conditions and restrictions as may be deemed wise.

3. That in view of the agricultural immigration now coming to our State we earnestly pray for an early consideration of this our memorial.

WILBRA H. SWETT,
Speaker of the House.
ALEX. C. BOTKIN,
President of the Senate.

Approved.

J. E. RICKARDS, Governor.

The above is a true copy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the bill be read at length and lie on the table.

The bill was read the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person may deposit in any United States mint gold or silver bullion not less in value than $50, and the same shall be coined free of charge (if the metal be sufficiently pure to need no refining), the gold into the coins provided for by existing laws and the silver into dollars nine-tenths fine, the weight of the pure silver in each dollar to be fifteen and one-half times the 23.22 grains, being the weight of the pure gold in the gold dollar; that is to say, 359.91 grains, which, with 39.99 grains of alloy, will make the total weight of each silver dollar 399.9 grains instead of 412½ grains as now by law provided.

SEC. 2. Payment shall be made to said depositor for such bullion in coins similar to those into which the metal is to be coined, or the Secretary of the Treasury at his option may pay the depositor in Treasury notes of convenient denominations promising to pay an equivalent number of dollars, which notes shall be redeemable in gold or silver at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. The silver dollars coined in accordance with this law, as well as the gold coins of the United States and the Treasury notes herein provided for, shall be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private. The existing silver dollars shall be retired and recoined according to the new rates, the profits accruing therefrom to be applied to the expenses of maintaining the mints.

SEC. 3. This law shall take effect and become operative when similar laws shall have been adopted by the Governments of England, France, and Germany; which laws shall in substance provide for the purchase of gold and silver bullion without limit, and shall make legal tender of the gold and the principal silver coins and any certificate representing them, the ratio between the gold and silver to be the same provided for in this act; and when such laws have been passed by the Governments aforesaid, the President shall make proclamation accordingly, and this law shall then take effect and be in force.

He also introduced a bill (S. 562) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," approved August 2, 1882; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 563) exempting American coastwise sailing vessels piloted by their licensed masters or by a United States pilot from the obligation to pay State pilots for services not rendered; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 564) providing for the collection of fees for furnishing certificates of title to vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 565) providing for the establishment and enforcement of rules and regulations for the use and navigation of United States canals and similar works of navigation, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 566) concerning measurement of vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 567) for the relief of the Continental Fire Insurance Company and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 568) granting a pension to Mrs. Ann M. Madden; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROACH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 569) for the relief of Everett Wroe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 570) for the relief of loyal citizens, therein named, of Loudoun County, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 571) for the relief of the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 572) providing penalties for charter violations by corporations operated in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying letter of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 15) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to donate to the Mountain View Cemetery Association, at Oakland, Cal., certain cannon, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 16) to remove suspension of payment of claim of estate of Roger A. Hiern; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. KYLE. Day before yesterday I introduced a bill (S. 106) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain damages resulting to any person who made entry upon lands within the present limits of the Sequoia and Yosemite National parks, in the State of California, prior to October 1, 1890. I asked to have the bill referred to the Select Committee on Forest Reservations. I notice that it has been referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I ask unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the select committee, to which it properly belongs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the change of reference will be made.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. DUBOIS submitted the following resolution as an amendment to the rules of the Senate; which was read, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the words "All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce," and inserting the following:

"The general appropriation bills shall be referred to committees as follows:

"To the Committee on Appropriations: The bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, and for all deficiencies.

"To the Committee on Agriculture: The bill for the Agricultural Department.

"To the Committee on Foreign Relations: The consular and diplomatic bill.

"To the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill for the military establishment, including the Military Academy.

"To the Committee on Naval Affairs: The bill for the naval establishment.

"To the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads: The Post-Office appropriation bill.

"To the Committee on Indian Affairs: The bill for Indians and Indian tribes.

"To the Committee on Commerce: The bill for rivers and harbors.

"To the Committee on Coast Defenses: The fortifications bill.

"To the Committee on the District of Columbia: The bill making appropriations for the District; and

"To the Committee on Pensions: The pension appropriation bills."

REPORT ON FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, it was Ordered, That the report of the commission appointed to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, known as the Dawes Commission, which report is attached to the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior as Exhibit A, be printed as a Senate document.

IMPRISONMENT OF GENERAL SANGUIALLY.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to send to the Senate all correspondence relating to the trial, conviction, and sentence to hard labor for life of General Sanguially, an American citizen, for alleged complicity in the war against Spain by the Cubans, and if no authentic record should be on file in the State Department, that the Secretary of State be directed to obtain a copy of the record of such trial.

RETIREMENT OF GREENBACKS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that it is unwise and inexpedient to retire the greenbacks.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas the Congress, March 3, 1891, passed a bill, which was approved by the President and became a law, appropriating $250,000 for the purchase of a site and the commencement of the construction of a public building at Portland, Oreg.; and

Whereas on March 2, 1895, the Congress passed another bill, which was approved by the President, appropriating an additional $100,000 for the continuation of the construction of such public building; and

Whereas in pursuance of such appropriations the United States purchased from one John McCraken block No. 51, in Couch's addition to the city of Portland, Oreg., for a site for such public building and received from said McCraken and wife a deed therefor, dated June 3, 1892, the consideration therefor being $160,000: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to advise the Senate at his earliest convenience as to what steps, if any, have been taken by the Department to prepare or procure plans for such building and for proceeding with the construction thereof; and if no steps have been taken, then the reasons fully why not and the cause of the delay in reference thereto.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I ask that the joint resolution, which I introduced on the 3d instant, in relation to according belligerent rights to the Cuban government be now laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution heretofore introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and laid on the table at his request. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 4) declaring that a state of public war exists in Cuba, and that belligerent rights be accorded to the Cuban government, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Government of the United States recognizes a condition of public war between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and the United States of America hereby declare that they will maintain a condition of strict neutrality between the contending powers and accord to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States. The Congress of the United States protest and remonstrate against the barbarous manner in which the war in Cuba has been conducted, and the President is hereby authorized to take such steps as may be expedient, in his judgment, to secure an observance of the laws of war as recognized by all civilized nations.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few observations in support of the joint resolution before its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Island of Cuba is within a few hours' travel of the southern boundary of the United States. It, with the adjacent keys upon the coast of Florida, constitutes, according to all military authority, the absolute control and power over the Gulf of Mexico. It is, perhaps, the most fertile region of the globe, capable of sustaining a population of eight or ten millions. The climate is adapted to the highest physical development of man. With a government properly constituted and properly administered, it would furnish a home and business for a large portion of the people of the United States. As it is, the country presents a spectacle of ruin, of misgovernment, of barbarous cruelty, which, to say the least, is a disgrace to this civilized age.

I am fully sensible of the great part which Spain has performed in the history of the world, of her ancient chivalry, of the great soldiers of which Gonsalvo de Cordova was the leader and the type, of the glories of the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, and of the noble traits of Spanish character, and I speak here of her misgovernment and oppression of the people of Cuba in no spirit of disparagement, but rather attributing these evils to the impossibility of good government under a despotic rule so far removed from the home Government and over a dependency where all classes of the people are resolved on a government founded on principles and organized with powers of their own choice. The heroic traits of Spanish character have been transmitted to their Cuban descendants. Their courage, their fortitude, their self-denial, their earnest convictions, and their enthusiastic patriotism are all possessed by their Cuban descendants, and these qualities make their struggle for freedom the more desperate and the more certain of success.

For more than a half century the people of Cuba have been endeavoring to free themselves, as other Spanish colonies have done, from the control of the European Government. They have exhibited a degree of patriotism, of courage, of capacity equal to any which has been presented in the records of history. They are a people of quick and lively intelligence, easily susceptible of education in the higher branches of learning, and, with the opportunities which they have had, their progress is remarkable. They have presented some of the most conspicuous instances of patriotism, of courage, and of ability which are to be found in history. The late Jose Marti, whose life was given disinterestedly to the cause of his fellow-countrymen, is second scarcely to any character in the pages of history; a man of distinguished learning; a man of independent fortune, devoting his entire life to the relief of his people from despotic government, from misgovernment, from cruelty, he is justly regarded as the patriot martyr of that country. So of the present generals in the field, who have come from places of safety to engage in the war, a war prosecuted by these people without means, without arms, without munitions of war, and a war which is the result of a unanimous sentiment upon the part of the people of all classes in Cuba.

This is not the first attempt that has been made by these people to establish an independent government, a government of their own. Incited by our example, instructed by our teachings, acting upon our advice, these people attempted in 1870 to accomplish their independence. For ten long years they maintained a successful war, and submitted only upon the promise that their grievances should be redressed. The report of a committee of the House of Representatives, a majority of whom adopted the report which I have in my hand, recognized the fact that these people were of right entitled to recognition as a belligerent power. This report, made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, Mr. Banks, is a full and complete history of that struggle. It contains the references to the public law, which I shall not weary the Senate with reading, conclusively evidencing that where a people are maintaining a civil war, where with any kind of organization, with stability and firmness, they are protecting themselves by the endeavor to establish an independent government of their own, that is a condition which entitles them to the consideration of other nations as belligerents, which entitles them to neutrality on the part of other Governments. In that report I find the following:

The principles involved in this struggle, therefore, are manifest. The people of Cuba fight for—Independence of Spain;
The right of self-government;
Religious liberty;
The abolition of slavery;
Universal suffrage;
The emancipation of industry and trade;
The freedom of speech and the press;
The rights of assembly and petition;
For general education; and
"All other inalienable rights of the people."

They fight for the termination of European Governments on this continent. They fight against Spanish tyranny; against monarchical, aristocratic, and personal government; against dignities and titles; against the corrupt duplication of offices; against slavery and the slave trade; and against the Government at Madrid, which, to use the language of General Prim, "in this contest stands before the world opposed to self-government, and resisting the abolition of slavery." It is to aid the Spanish cause that Spain appeals to us, and it is against her policy, revolting to the spirit of the age and the theory and practice of the American Government from its foundation, that we protest.

CUBAN FORCES.

The Cubans had at Yara October 11, 1868, 147 men; 4,000 the 12th of October; 9,700 in November, and 12,000 in December. They have now 10,000 well-armed men. There are 60,000 enrolled and drilled, but without arms. They claim that with a supply of arms they can put into the field 100,000 or 200,000 fighting men—citizens, farmers, and emancipated blacks—men of the country fighting for its liberties.

MILITARY OPERATIONS.

These hostile forces have not forgotten the objects for which they were organized. From the declaration of Cuban independence at Yara to this hour there has not been a week, scarcely a day, which has not been marked in the calendar of war by fierce and bloody contests. No revolution presents a more constant and determined struggle. Although the Cubans were undisciplined and unaccustomed to the use of arms, of which in the beginning they had few or none, and their enemy was composed of the best troops of the army and navy of Spain, whose places in the military posts of the island had been supplied by the resident Spaniards organized as volunteers, the Cubans nevertheless have been ready to meet their foes in skirmish, combat, or battle, and have shown themselves as brave in attack as defense. A record of two hundred skirmishes, combats, engagements, and battles, occurring from the 11th of October, 1868, to the defeat of Puello and Goyeneche, which terminated the campaign of December, 1869, and January, 1870, give an honorable distinction to the struggle of the Cubans for independence that would in nowise discredit a people long accustomed to self-government or trained to the use of arms.

IT IS REGARDED AS WAR BY SPAIN AND THE UNITED STATES, AND IS SO INTENDED BY CUBA.

The proclamation of the captain-general, dated July 8, 1869, declares that the war of insurrection against Spain demands speedy and exemplary punishment, and decrees the penalty of death upon those who may be captured in arms.

The American consul at Santiago de Cuba informs the Secretary of State, June 19, 1869, that the Spanish Government applies the most rigorous and barbarous laws, which have made it a war of extermination, shocking to every civilized nation. (Page 98.)

Count Valmaseda issued a decree April 4, 1869, which declares that there is no longer a place for neutrality; that those who were not for him were against him; and, that his soldiers might know how to distinguish them, they were called upon to observe the orders they themselves carried:

1. Every man, from the age of 15 years upward, found away from his habitation, who does not prove a justified motive therefor, will be shot.
2. Every habitation unoccupied will be burned by the troops.
3. Every habitation, from which does not float a white flag, as a signal that its occupants desire peace, will be reduced to ashes. (Page 83.)

The Secretary of State, May 19, is instructed by the President to protest in the most forcible manner against such a mode of warfare, and demands that persons having a right to claim the protection of the United States shall not be sacrificed or injured in the conduct of hostilities upon this basis.

The American consul-general at Habana recently received from the British naval officers the assurance of their protection and the offer of a file of marines to protect him whenever it became necessary to seek his safety on board a British man-of-war. And, still later, the American vice-consul at Santiago de Cuba was called to account for dispatches sent to his Government, and published by the order of Congress, by the unauthorized and irresponsible volunteers who govern Cuba; and, under the advice of the Spanish governor, who was unable to protect him, sought his safety from personal violence by taking refuge on board a French frigate, under the protection of French naval officers.

Here upon our immediate shores, here where a people following the declarations of our Declaration of Independence and the principles upon which this Government is founded, a people with acknowledged grievances which all the departments of this Government have affirmed, which the report of the committee of the House of Representatives has declared, which the Secretaries of State for more than twenty-five years, yes, I will say for more than fifty years, have repeatedly brought to the attention of this Government; a people to whom neither law nor liberty is allowed; a people as to whom the laws of war are not regarded by the dominant government, against whom a war merciless in respect to age, sex, and condition is maintained in a case of this kind, where these people, acting upon the principles which we have declared and the advice which we have given to them, assert precisely the same principles and by force of arms endeavor to obtain them, that we should silently permit this war to proceed without a single word of encouragement, without a single word of protection to their legitimate and recognized rights, is certainly not creditable to this Government, and is certainly not in accordance with justice, or with that high position which this people ought to take, and when we affirm the Monroe doctrine, if we permit instances of this kind to occur beneath our very eyes and within our reach, the affirmation is a vain one and should carry no weight or respect with it.

I have here a report, which I shall presently read, from a citizen who has recently been in Mexico and in Cuba, a man of character, of intelligence, a correspondent of the public press, which exhibits a condition of things which imperatively demands immediate action on the part of this Government.

As I have said, the question of public law is a clear one. It is affirmed by Mr. Webster, it is affirmed by Mr. Everett, it is affirmed by all our public authorities, that a state of civil war actually existing, maintained with persistency and earnestness, entitles the parties maintaining that war to recognition as belligerents. In the case of Hungary many years ago the President of the United States sent an agent to examine into the condition of the insurrection or the civil war, with instructions to him, which I have here, that if he found that it was a stable, persistent determination of the people of that country to establish an independent and free government, to say to them that the United States would accord to them not only belligerent rights, but recognize them as an independent power.

The action of President Taylor, through Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, in sending, in June, 1849, Mr. A. D. Mann as a special agent to investigate the condition of the Hungarian insurrection, is elsewhere considered. (Supra, § 47.) In Mr. Mann's instructions, June 18, 1849, is the following:

"Should the new Government prove to be, in your opinion, firm and stable, the President will cheerfully recommend to Congress at their next session the recognition of Hungary, and you might intimate, if you should see fit, that the President would in that event be gratified to receive a diplomatic agent from Hungary in the United States by or before the next meeting of Congress, and that he entertains no doubt whatever that in case her new Government should prove to be firm and stable, her independence would be speedily recognized by that enlightened body."

President Grant, in his second annual message, in 1870, said:

As soon as I learned that a republic had been proclaimed at Paris and that the people of France had acquiesced in the change, the minister of the United States was directed by telegraph to recognize it and to tender my congratulations and those of the people of the United States. The reestablishment in France of a system of government disconnected with the dynastic traditions of Europe appeared to be a proper subject for the felicitations of Americans. Should the present struggle result in attaching the hearts of the French to our simpler forms of representative government, it will be a subject of still further satisfaction to our people. While we make no effort to impose our institutions upon the inhabitants of other countries, and while we adhere to our traditional neutrality in civil contests elsewhere, we can not be indifferent to the spread of American political ideas in a great and highly civilized country like France.

President Jefferson, in his third annual message, in 1803, said:

Congress witnessed, at their last session, the extraordinary agitation produced in the public mind by the suspension of our right of deposit at the port of New Orleans, no assignment of another place having been made according to treaty.

Mr. Jefferson, in writing to President Madison, April 27, 1809, said:

It will be objected to our receiving Cuba that no limit can then be drawn to our future acquisitions. Cuba can be defended by us without a navy.

Mr. Everett, in discussing the territorial growth of the United States, used the following language:

The Island of Cuba lies at our doors. It commands the approach to the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. It bars the entrance of that great river which drains half the North American Continent, and with its tributaries forms the largest system of internal water communication in the world. It keeps watch at the doorway of our intercourse with California by the Isthmus route.

Mr. Everett, writing to Lord John Russell, in 1853, said:

A recent impartial French traveler, M. Ampère, confirms this impression. All the ordinary political rights enjoyed in free countries are denied to the people of that island. The government is, in principle, the worst form of despotism, namely, absolute authority delegated to a military viceroy, and supported by an army from abroad. I speak of the nature of the government, and not of the individuals by whom it is administered, for I have formed a very favorable opinion of the personal character of the present captain-general, as of one or two of his predecessors.

I have here a report which I shall proceed to read. As I have stated, it is from a person who has been formerly connected with the diplomatic affairs of this country in foreign countries, a man of accurate observation, with ample means of observation, a man of character and reliability in every respect. He says:

I came from Mexico to New York by sea, stopping at Habana. I discovered one thing before I had been there six hours, that none of the official reports sent from Cuba portrayed the real condition of affairs. I met a vast number of people and a number of haciendados, or planters, from the Santa Clara district. I failed to find one Cuban under the age of 35 who was not an office-holder who was not in complete sympathy with the insurgents.

In Habana the feeling is very strong for the belligerents, but the city is so covered with spies that it is difficult for anyone but an American to learn the truth. I was told, and I soon saw for myself, that Habana was as strongly revolutionary as any part of the island. The business condition of that city is deplorable, and will be much worse if the insurgents prevent the grinding of the crops. It is hourly expected that such an order will be issued to the haciendados. This will bring about a complete paralysis of the island, and will make out of every laborer a revolutionist. On the boat from Habana to New York I met one of the wealthiest planters of the Santa Clara district, who is a son of a Spanish marquis. He was introduced to me in Habana as one of the most influential men of the island. He says that it is a great error that the insurgents are made up mostly of negroes. He has been among them, and says they are as fine a body of men as could be gotten together. He had abandoned his hacienda because he had been ordered not to grind. He says that it will not be an unpopular movement for the insurgents to prevent the grinding over the entire island, because every man who owns a foot of land knows that this is the only way to bring the revolution to a close. He says, however, that the insurgent leaders are only waiting to see what this Congress will do. If the United States or other nations fail to recognize the belligerency of Cuba by January the grinding will be prevented. This is a difficult thing to do. The grinding will begin in December. It must be understood that the sugar cane is only planted once in ten or twelve years. There will be no invasion of the plantations, but when a planter continues to grind when ordered not to do so several insurgents are sent out to get employment at such places. When the wind is favorable the cane is fired, and there is no power under heaven that can prevent its total destruction. The planters know this, and will make no attempt to grind if ordered not to do so. Many have already ceased to grind preparatory to the order being issued.

I was told by a number of Cubans who are of pure Spanish descent that it is impossible to put down this revolution even by concessions. The war up to this time has been purely guerrilla fighting. The insurgents fire from ambush and before the Spanish army can recover themselves the insurgents have fled. This is kept up on all the lines of march of the Spanish troops and they are harassed even after they are encamped. But every time the insurgents fire and retreat it is given out officially that they were routed. In Mexico there are a number of young men who have been sent there by their families for fear they would join openly in the rebellion. On the boat with me from Habana there were three whom I was told by other Cubans were being sent abroad until the revolution is over. They, with six others, had left Habana and joined the belligerents. They were recaptured, and their family influence was such that they were sent from the island instead of being imprisoned. The whole hope and feeling of the Cubans, so far as I could learn, is to become a State in the Union. A business man told me in Habana that even the Spanish themselves on the island admit that any condition would be better than that now existing.

The same statement contained in the correspondence is found in the report made by General Banks twenty-five years ago. During all that period of time these people, being promised some relief from the condition of oppressive taxation, of despotic rule which prevailed over them, have been contending against these evils, and now, finding the situation intolerable, finding that property yields no return, that labor is without adequate compensation, that no native Cuban is allowed to hold any office of dignity or trust, that the natives are entirely deprived of all control over their own country and their own affairs, and a military despotism constantly maintained and supported by armed troops brought from Spain, they have protested in the face of the civilized world against these wrongs. They have the same cause precisely that we had for our Declaration of Independence. We may take phrase by phrase that great proclamation which resounded throughout the world with a gleam of hope to all oppressed people, and we will find that their case is parallel in all respects to our own. Take the declaration that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed and that they have a right to assert a change in their form of government when oppressed and deprived of the objects for which government is instituted. We find that the Cubans are precisely in line with ourselves in that respect, and they have a right to claim whatever consideration the public law will allow a power in that condition.

Mr. President, I ask the immediate consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the joint resolution. American citizens are being imprisoned. I understand that General Sanguilly, whom the paper reports was sentenced to hard labor for life, is an American citizen, entitled to the protection of this Government. I am informed, whether correctly or not I am unable to state, that his trial was a mock trial; that there is no just ground of suspicion even against him, much less proof; that it is true he was a general and a leader in the former revolution, but that he has taken no part, whatever his sympathies may be, in the present struggle. If that be true, then it is the imperative duty of this Government to interfere. If there are other cases in which Americans have been deprived of their rights, it is the imperative duty of this Government to interfere. But beyond that, what considerations of public policy are there which justify Spain in continuing to enforce her Government over those people?

The island is very remote from her home country—from the Kingdom of Spain. Cuba is the last remaining vestige, with the little island immediately adjacent to it, of her vast dominion upon this continent. It is a great expense to her. It must yield in the future to the rapidly increasing population of the American Republics and to the force which they can bring to bear. It must yield to the consideration of the necessity for the control of that island by this Government, with its seventy million people, soon to be one hundred million. The future renders it impossible that Spain can maintain her dominion there. Why, then, should not this great Government say that this butchery and destruction of human life shall cease? Why shall we not say to Spain, in peaceable and respectful negotiations, that we are willing to protect the people of Cuba, and to make to her such compensation as may be reasonably adequate, she being the responsible party? I can see no reason why we should not do so.

That island must be subject to our dominion in some shape, and although annexation is not now desirable, yet it is desirable that those people should be an independent people, and that they should be subject to our protection. The island should not be a place from which, under any condition whatever, hostile fleets or hostile armies can be directed against the United States or against our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico. There are, therefore, no considerations of policy which can justify our further aiding the Government of Spain in subjecting Cuba to her domination, nor can there be any considerations in the interest of Spain herself which would justify such a policy.

I see in the public prints which I have here that the people of Spain are themselves beginning to revolt against the home Government; that the vast expense with which this struggle is burdening the people of Spain is creating discontent. It will inevitably destroy the dynasty of the Government if it is persisted in, because the Cuban people stand upon the everlasting principles of right. If our Government is a true government, and is founded upon a true declaration of principles, they have a right to establish their independence. They are justified in the assertion of that right by the oppression and the misgovernment which for more than a century has been imposed upon them. They are justified by the natural and proper ambition of any people for prosperity and for reasonable promotion for their young men in the public service. With one-half the evils that exist in Cuba our people would long ago have risen in revolt against any government, even if it sacrificed the last man in the country.

So, Mr. President, in my judgment there is no consideration which forbids us from immediately according to these people the rights of belligerents in our ports and territory. It would be no cause of offense to Spain. Spain declared that the Confederacy was a belligerent power and recognized it. The proclamation of the English Government recognized the civil war in the South. Both of those proclamations I have in my hand. When this people have acted upon our example, upon our advice, under our instruction; when they are asserting precisely the rights which we have declared in the face of the world justify forcible resistance, the organization of a new government and the establishment of its powers in accordance with their wishes; when they are pursuing precisely the course which we have advised them to pursue, with what justice or propriety can this great people hesitate to accord to them the full rights of belligerents, when Spain did it to the South, when England did it by proclamation? It seems to me we should be glad to do it; that we should embrace eagerly the opportunity to encourage those people by extending to them the same aid that we do to the Spanish Government. Yet what is our attitude?

This Government is actually giving aid and comfort to the Spaniards against the Cubans. It is the power of this Government that to-day maintains the Spanish army in the Island of Cuba. It is this Government which is responsible for the outrages. I do not mean to say that it is the President or his Cabinet, but that it is this Government, and the attitude it occupies in all its branches in not declaring that those people are entitled to belligerent rights in our ports and territory, which to-day is maintaining the power of Spain in the Island of Cuba.

We allow munitions of war to be bought by Spain, we allow ships to be fitted out, we allow Spain to purchase whatever is necessary in the way of supplies to continue the war, but the Cubans are prohibited from doing so, and the whole power of our Government is exercised to deprive them of these rights in our territory. I say there is no ground of public law and no ground of public policy in respect to our relations, present and future, with the Island of Cuba which justify it. I say there is no ground of justice that permits it; no ground of humanity that would tolerate it. It will be a disgrace to our country if a people following our example, acting upon our advice, a people who can claim that every line in our Declaration of Independence furnishes a parallel to their own case, shall, by our aid and our acquiescence, be permitted to be crushed, their women and children murdered, and merciless war maintained against them.

My attention has been called to a proclamation of General Gomez in regard to the destruction of property. The report which I have read explains that matter. It is not a destruction of property. It is simply a declaration that as a military necessity the operation of grinding cane and manufacturing sugar shall not, for the present, be continued. The cane is not destroyed. It is only destroyed where the military order is disobeyed. My information is that the Cuban owners of this property, and even the Spaniards who own it, concur in this order and recognize its propriety and wisdom. But if that were not so, what comparison does that bear to the merciless destruction of human life which is carried on by the other side? What of the arrest and trial upon suspicion of citizens, subjects of Spain or American citizens, and their transportation to the penal colony of Spain, with all its horrors?

Mr. President, I hope the Committee on Foreign Relations will take this subject into consideration. I hope it will not postpone action, but that it will be moved by these considerations to report at an early day in favor of the joint resolution which I introduced, or some other measure that will accord to the people of Cuba the same rights in our territory and our courts that are now given to Spain—the rights which a neutral Government accords whenever there is a condition of civil war. As I have said, I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate for any length of time by reading the various authorities upon the subject of international war, of public war, in case of resistance by a people, but I will read a few citations here.

A civil war—

is when a party arises in a State which no longer obeys the sovereign, and is sufficiently strong to make head against him, or when, in a Republic, the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms.

* * * * * * *

When a part of a State takes up arms against the Government, if it is sufficiently strong to resist its action, and to constitute two parties of equally balanced forces, the existence of civil war is thenceforward determined.

* * * * * * *

It is no ground of offense to a nation that civil war is recognized as a public condition of war. It is no ground of offense that neutrality between the contending parties is declared to be the proper attitude of other nations toward such a struggle.

So said Mr. Webster, so said Mr. Frelinghuysen, so declared Mr. Everett, and there is an extensive correspondence here, setting forth by all these different officials and Secretaries of our Government the same declaration of atrocious war, of merciless hostility, of civil war in its most cruel form by the Spanish Government upon the people of Cuba. Here is a half century of declarations of an authentic character from our own Government and our own Secretaries of State, declaring that those people are not only engaged in a war which entitles them to recognition, but that it is a war in which humanity itself demands that they should be accorded the rights of belligerents.

Mr. President, I submit that Cuba is "the queen of the Antilles." It is the most desirable place of residence in the West India Islands for the human race. The conditions of life are easier there; there is less of extreme poverty; labor obtains a more adequate and more comfortable reward than anywhere else. The day will come when it will be the Garden of Eden of the human race. The day will come when a confederated republic of the islands of the West Indies will be established. Unless this civilization of ours is a failure, and this republican Government of ours a fraud and a falsehood, it is the part of wisdom that we should recognize the fact. If these free institutions of ours are to build up a happy people, are to ameliorate the poverty of the world, are to create a higher condition of humanity, it is the part of wise statesmanship in us to say that the cruelties of merciless war shall not be practiced upon a people immediately within our reach and following our example, taught by our precepts to do that which they are doing.

I hope that the disgrace we are now under of actually aiding the Government of Spain by the present condition of the public laws in oppression and merciless rule over these people will be avoided by early action on the part of Congress.

The people of the United States with great unanimity desire this action from us, and require such proceeding as will secure freedom and independence to Cuba.

The will of the people has been expressed in great meetings in New York, Chicago, and the cities of the several States.

It is not the part of friendship to Spain to delay this action. The sooner the United States speaks in determined but friendly and respectful terms the better for Spain, and for Cuba, and all the best interests of the nations.

For all these reasons I urge on the committee and on the Senate the passage of the resolutions as the first step to be taken in the interests of peace and of staying a merciless and cruel war.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the joint resolution be again read.

The Secretary again read joint resolution S. R. 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint Resoution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 9, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 5, 1895.

ENVOYS EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Matt W. Ransom, of North Carolina, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to Mexico.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 6, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last was read and approved.

PRINTING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, after the reading of the President's message, I made a motion, which was adopted, that the message be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and also that 5,000 copies be printed for the use of the members of the House. I have since learned, on examination of the proceedings of the last Congress, that provision is already made by the existing law for the printing of 10,000 copies of the message for the use of the House and 5,000 for the use of the Senate. The motion I made on Tuesday last was unnecessary; and I desire, therefore, to move to reconsider that vote for the purpose of rescinding the action taken with reference to the printing of the message.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the vote will be reconsidered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, we do not understand the request of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The resolution to print the 5,000 copies of the President's message was unnecessary, and is embarrassing, inasmuch as the existing law provides for the printing; and the gentleman from New York asks consent that the motion to print be rescinded. Such action will be taken without formality if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Terry] was not present when the members were sworn in on Monday last, and I ask that the oath be now administered to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner] is also present. If there are other gentlemen present who have not yet taken the oath they can be sworn in at this time, if they come forward.

Mr. Boatner and Mr. Terry were then qualified, taking the oath of office required by law.

COMMITTEE ON MILEAGE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following members to constitute the Committee on Mileage: ASHLEY B. WRIGHT, of Massachusetts; JOHN A. BARHAM, of California; ORLANDO BURRELL, of Illinois, and GEORGE C. PENDLETON, of Texas.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting detailed statement of the expenditures of the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of the contingent expenses of the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

PROPERTY REPORT, SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, transmitting a list of property in his possession belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

FINANCIAL REPORT, SERGEANT-AT-ARMS HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the financial report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Court of Claims of judgments rendered by that court for the year ended November 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INVENTORY OF PROPERTY, CLERK HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, transmitting an inventory of the public property in his possession on December 2, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

CLAIM OF JAMES C. SOAPE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting the claim of James C. Soape, late postmaster at Shreveport, La., for reimbursement on account of loss resulting from theft in his office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

DUTIES ON CERTAIN IMPORTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the United States consul at Belfast, Ireland, relating to certain duties; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

EXPENDITURES, DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Labor, submitting a statement of all moneys expended under his direction during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ANNUAL REPORT, COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting the annual report of his office for the year ended October 31, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railway Company for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

NEW CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of Brig. Gen. T. Lincoln Casey, United States Army, concerning the construction of the building for the use of the Library of Congress for the year ended December 1, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SALES OF WASTE PAPER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Doorkeeper of the House, transmitting a statement of the sales of waste paper since the commencement of the first session of the Fifty-third Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

EXPENDITURES, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a detailed statement of the expenditures of all appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, including supplemental accounts to date; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOATNER, until January 1, on account of important business.

To Mr. LEISENRING, for this day, on account of important business.

REVISED STATUTES FOR HOUSE LIBRARY.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish the House of Representatives, for the use of the House library, 50 copies of the Revised Statutes of the United States (second edition, 1878), and also 50 copies of the Supplement of the Revised Statutes of the United States (volume 1, second edition, 1874-1891).

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MONTHLY STATEMENT OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine presents a joint resolution, which will be reported to the House by the Clerk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the monthly summary statement of imports and exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

Resolved, etc., That there shall be printed monthly by the Public Printer 3,500 copies of the monthly summary statement of imports and exports and other statistical information prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 500 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for that resolution arises out of an accidental omission in the printing act of January last. Prior to the passage of that act of January last the monthly statements of imports and exports and other statistics prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics were printed by requisition of the Treasury Department; but the printing act of January last provided that there should not be printed exceeding 1,000 copies of any document for which any Department should make requisition. Now, the Treasury Department has already had 1,000 copies, and has used that 1,000 copies for the purpose of foreign exchanges and also for the purpose of acquainting collectors of customs with certain necessary facts. The Treasury Department requires 2,000 copies. There have been none since February last for distribution among either Senators or Representatives. This is an exceedingly important document for the information of both Senators and Representatives. As the document has been put in type and stereotyped, no other expense will be required to print additional copies except simply the cost of paper and presswork, folding, and binding. So there will be little expense attending it. That will come from the ordinary appropriation for printing. Therefore, in accordance with the suggestion of the Government Printer, and in accordance with the suggestion of gentlemen who have been unable to obtain copies of this important document, as the October statement is now ready for printing, it is desirable that this action should be taken by the House and concurred in by the Senate immediately, without waiting for the appointment of committees.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a minute?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] one minute.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am very heartily in sympathy with the joint resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine. It seems to me it is absolutely necessary for the transaction of business in an intelligent way that the members should have access to the reports. I want to be indulged in making one other observation, that the printing and document bill, if I may so call it, which was passed about the close of the last Congress, whatever its general merits may prove to be, is breeding much of trouble, disappointment, and friction in the transaction of business; and is likely to do so in many respects, some of which I can now foresee, and many of which, no doubt, I can not now foretell. For instance, I wanted a copy of the RECORD. I was informed that there were but 10 copies for the use of House committees. I hope that at an early day somebody will take up this subject and at least contrive that we may have such documents for the use of House committees and members as are necessary for the orderly transaction of business.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield such time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] as he may desire.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Maine. I could not hear what he said, but from what I gathered of his remarks his resolution provides for the printing of 35,000 copies of this document every month.

Mr. DINGLEY. Thirty-five hundred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Thirty-five hundred.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the Clerk please look and see whether there is any error as to that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was read 35,000 copies.

The SPEAKER. The resolution reads 3,500.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I believe this is in the form of a joint resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Had it not better be a concurrent resolution? The printing for the two Houses is usually done under a concurrent resolution. If this joint resolution should be passed it will have to go to the President for his approval.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is a permanent law, and should go to the President for his approval.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly, any permanent law should go to the President for his approval; but the printing for the two Houses is usually done under a concurrent resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is not only for the House and the Senate, but for the Treasury Department and for distribution also. A joint resolution is the proper form.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, in reference to a remark made by the gentleman from Illinois in his criticism of the printing law, if it has the effect he states—that of cutting down the printing—then I want to say that the House and the country ought to be congratulated on its passage. Now, as to the other part of his question, I think he will find a sufficient number of RECORDS printed for the use of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the printing was abolished so as to economize, why not abolish all printing and make a further reduction.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We need some, but not all the printing we were doing, and we economized as much as possible by the passage of the law.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution of information, which I ask to have read, and then I will ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire offers a resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its present consideration.

The resolution, calling on the Secretary of Agriculture for information as to the purchase and distribution of valuable seed and the publication and distribution of farmers' bulletins, was read.

The SPEAKER. The present consideration of this resolution requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, as that resolution is not in the form that resolutions of inquiry are usually presented, I think it ought to go to the committee, in order that it may be put in the form that is customary when calling on the Departments for information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman tell in what it differs from the usual form?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman will have no difficulty in discovering. I do not wish to criticise the resolution as introduced, but think that it would be better that it proceed in the usual order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. On the contrary, I assert that it is the usual method of procedure in these cases.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the resolution being introduced for reference to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture when appointed.

ARMENIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, representing, as I do, more than one-tenth of the American citizens of Armenian birth and more than one-fifteenth of all persons of Armenian birth in this country, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that it be read and printed in the RECORD, together with a short petition which accompanies it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the reading to the House and the printing in the RECORD of the resolution which he sends to the desk.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Accompanied by the petition.

The SPEAKER. Accompanied by the petition.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. To be read for the information of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let it be read for information.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to ask if it is the intention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to refer the resolution to some committee.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly. My motion includes the reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CRISP. Before it is read, there is an inquiry that will arise continually in the House, and I take the liberty of making the point now in order that the Chair may pass upon it. A gentleman sends up a resolution such as this—I do not even know what it is—and asks unanimous consent that it be read and printed in the RECORD. Of course the House is not aware of the contents of the paper until it is read. After it is read, it occurs to some gentleman that it is improper that it be printed, or, unless the mover of the resolution asks unanimous consent for consideration, that it should be considered. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is, does the resolution in such a case go into the RECORD? Having been read at the Clerk's desk, is it to be printed in the RECORD as part of the proceedings of the House?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am willing that objection shall be made after the resolution is read, if any gentleman then desires to object.

Mr. CRISP. The question is one that is constantly arising in the proceedings of the House. A gentleman sends up a resolution and asks unanimous consent that it be considered, but when it is read some member makes objection. Now, the question is whether in such a case the resolution is to be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. After the reading of this resolution, if anyone objects I shall not insist.

The SPEAKER. The present impression of the Chair is that the determination of the question raised by the gentleman from Georgia must depend very much upon circumstances. There might be cases in which it would be essential that the resolution should be printed in order to explain and justify the proceedings of the House; but if objection was made before the proposition was actually read, then it seems to me it might be ruled out entirely. I do not, however, speak advisedly upon the question at this time.

Mr. CRISP. Of course the Chair sees how embarrassment may arise, as in this case. A member asks to have some proposition read and gentlemen feel, as they feel in this case, unwilling to object to its being read, as that would hardly seem courteous; yet it may be that if they knew in advance what was contained in the resolution they would object if they understood that it was also to go into the RECORD.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that this matter has been submitted to some of the most discreet gentlemen in the House.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I acquit the gentleman from Massachusetts of any purpose to do anything indiscreet. Everyone who knows the gentleman knows that he would not be guilty of an indiscreet action. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. In this case, inasmuch as the request is simply to have the resolution read to the House and printed in the RECORD, if, after the reading, objection is made, the Chair will understand that it is not to be printed in the RECORD. That will dispose of this case unless some gentleman objects to the view of the Chair. The Clerk will read.

The preamble and resolution offered by Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts were then read at length.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon printing in the RECORD the resolution which has just been read, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] asks unanimous consent that it be so printed. Is there objection?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman and his resolution involve too delicate questions to have the seeming assent of the House in the existing condition of affairs; and I therefore object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JENKINS: A bill (H. R. 160) to extend to Superior, Wis., the privileges of the seventh section of an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880—to the Committee on Commerce.

JAMES DONALD CAMERON, a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, DAVID B. HILL, a Senator from the State of New York, and J. L. M. IRBY, a Senator from the State of South Carolina, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect from the State of Louisiana, whose credentials have heretofore been presented, is now present. He will please come forward and receive the oath of office.

Mr. Donelson Caffery, chosen by the legislature of Louisiana a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1895, was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. VILAS, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

MARITIME CANAL COMPANY OF NICARAGUA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with law, the annual report of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua; which was, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, pursuant to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act of March 2, 1895, a review and report upon the conclusions of law reached by the Department of the Interior on account of moneys due the Cherokee Nation under certain treaties and the laws passed to carry them into effect; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the conclusion of the routine morning business, for the purpose of submitting some remarks thereon, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 12) to enforce the Monroe doctrine, heretofore introduced by me.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the students and teachers of the Ohio Normal University, of Ada, Ohio, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Sarah C. Holmes, of Hopewell, Ill., together with sundry affidavits, praying that relief be granted her under the French spoliation act, as one of the heirs of Benjamin Taber, deceased; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minerva, Ohio, and a petition of sundry teachers and students of the Ohio Normal University, of Ada, Ohio, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a petition of the Cozad Grain Company of Cozad, Nebr., signed by J. B. Hogarth, of Cozad, Nebr., and J. B. Hogarth, of Willow Island, Nebr., setting forth that a corporation called the Omaha Elevator Company are engaged in interstate commerce by the purchase of grain and other articles, and that owing to unlawful rebates given them they have been able to crush out all competition at various points. The petitioners pray for an investigation by Congress into the affairs of the elevator company. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition signed by the mayor, the pastors of the several churches, and sundry other citizens of Newport, R. I., praying for the adoption of measures by Congress to prevent the burning and lynching of American citizens; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of the legislature of Wyoming, praying for the enactment of legislation restricting indiscriminate immigration; which was read and referred to the Committee on Immigration, as follows:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 3, of the Third State legislature of Wyoming, has been compared with the original, which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said memorial and of the whole thereof, together with the indorsements thereon.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Enrolled joint memorial No. 3, house of representatives, Wyoming. Memorializing Congress for the restriction of immigration.]

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Wyoming, having in view the welfare and wishes of the people of this State, declare unqualifiedly in favor of the adequate restriction by Congress of the United States of immigration thereto from foreign countries. The interests of the entire people demand a speedy relief, and your memorialists therefore pray and earnestly urge the honorable Congress of the United States to immediately enact such laws as will properly restrict the indiscriminate immigration that now threatens to overwhelm this nation; and, as in duty bound, your memorialists will every pray, etc.

Resolved by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, That an authenticated copy of this memorial and resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to each Senator and to the Representative in Congress from this State, and they are hereby respectfully requested to present the same to the honorable the Senate and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and to urge necessary legislation in the premises.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Joint memorial No. 5, house of representatives, Wyoming. To the Congress of the United States of America.]

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memoralized and petitioned to grant unto the State of Wyoming the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands within such State.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 18, A. D. 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

[Indorsements.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Cheyenne, February 16, 1895.

I hereby certify that the within enrolled act originated in the house of representatives.

M. C. BARROW, Clerk.

Received from the governor and filed this 19th day of February, 1895.

CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WARREN presented the following petition of the legislature of Wyoming; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of house joint resolution No. 6, of the Third State legislature of Wyoming, has been carefully compared with the original, which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said resolution and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

[Third legislature of the State of Wyoming. Enrolled joint resolution No. 6, house of representatives, Wyoming. To the Congress of the United States.]

Your memorialists, the legislature of the State of Wyoming, respectfully represent as follows:

First. That there exists in the northeastern portion of the Wind River or Shoshone Indian Reservation, in this State, a number of hot springs, known as the Big Horn Hot Springs, the waters of which contain rare medicinal properties.

Second. That the Big Horn Hot Springs are not used to any appreciable extent by the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians who are upon that reservation.

Third. That there are magnificent hot springs other than the Big Horn Hot Springs in the vicinity of the agency upon that reservation, which are used by the Indians.

Fourth. That there are not, at or within many miles of these springs, any adequate accommodations for the care and comfort of invalids, and that adequate accommodations can not be prepared under the present laws and regulations.

Fifth. That the rare virtues of the Big Horn Hot Springs have become a matter of public notoriety, and many invalids have visited them and been cured. The number of invalids who have visited these springs during five months of the past summer was over 100 daily.

Resolved, That the legislature, in view of the foregoing facts, respectfully urges the Government to make a treaty with the Shoshone and Arapahoe Indians for the cession to the State of Wyoming of a tract of land 20 miles square, including that upon which the Big Horn Hot Springs are located, in the northeast corner of their reservation.

Resolved further, That upon the adoption of these resolutions the secretary of state is hereby instructed to send an authenticated copy of them to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with the request that they take the steps necessary to secure the cession of land to the State of Wyoming as herein requested.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 18, 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of many citizens of Skagit County, in the State of Washington, with reference to what is called Swinomish Slough. This is a body of navigable water extending from La Conner, in Skagit County, to the tide flats at the head of what is known as Padilla Bay. The slough is now only navigable for steamers upon the Sound at high tide, and the petitioners pray that an additional appropriation be made for the improvement of this slough, as very great advantage will accrue thereby to the entire nation, particularly all parties navigating the waters of Puget Sound, from the fact that the opening up of the slough will give a direct route from Seattle, Tacoma, and other large cities and towns upon the Sound, thus avoiding the open straits and the dangers from the winds and waves of the ocean in passing through what is known as Deception Pass, which furnishes waterway between Fidalgo and Whidby Island, and which is also dangerous to navigation on account of the narrowness of the channel and the strong and dangerous tidal currents.

There is a class of vessels of moderate draft which now have to go through this pass and out into the open straits on their way to the cities on Bellingham Bay. The opening up of this Swinomish Slough passage will give them a direct inland route between the archipelago and the mainland. Congress has already taken up this improvement and there have been considerable appropriations made for the purpose, but not enough to make the money already spent effective, and it is needful now to obtain sufficient money to complete the improvement. There is an extremely rich and productive region all along the line of this interior channel, which is famous for its crops of cereals, especially oats.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Port Townsend, in the State of Washington, concerning the military reservation known as Fort Townsend, in Jefferson County, in that State, which has been abandoned by the War Department and transferred to the Interior Department. The petitioners pray that in case of any disposition of these lands by the General Government restitution be made for the loss sustained by the locality in which it is situated for the relief of school district No. 1, and in aid of and in furtherance of the free-school system.

I will state that I have personally conferred with citizens and business men of Port Townsend in a large meeting held with a view to consider this question, and I know it to be the unanimous sentiment of the people of that section of the State that the land comprised in this abandoned reservation should be transferred to the authorities of the school district in which the land is situated. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Thirty-second Ward Republican Club, of Chicago, Ill., praying that the United States Government put forth its best efforts to prevent the further massacre of Armenians in the Turkish dominion and insisting that the Government of Turkey guarantee to the Armenians safety of life, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of William Kirbaugh, of Dahlgren, Ill., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 329, to remove the charge of desertion from his record as a soldier; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of J. M. Gale, of Yorkville, Ill., praying for the adoption of a system of Government banking; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by Gen. George A. McCall Post, No. 31, Grand Army of the Republic, of Westchester, Pa., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by the board of managers of the Trades League, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an appropriation be made for the removal of the shoals in the Delaware Bay and River beginning at Duck Creek Flats and extending upstream to the head of deep-water navigation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Council No. 85, American Protective Association, of Harrisburg, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution compelling aliens to reside a number of years in this country before the voting franchise is extended to them; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the system of internal taxation and the imposition of any new tariff tax upon materials which can not be produced at home, and praying that the single ad valorem duties in the present tariff be changed to specific or mixed ad valorem and specific duties, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Kansas City, Mo., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

USE OF COURT-HOUSES AT SCRANTON AND WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

Mr. PUGH. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsyluania permission to use the United States court-houses at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa., to report it with the recommendation that it pass with two amendments. The amendments are, first, in line 9 to strike out the words "time of such occupation shall begin, to wit, in" and insert "first day of," and, second, to strike out the preamble. I am instructed by the committee to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in line 9, after the words "from the," to strike out the words "time of such occupation shall begin, to wit, in" and insert "first day of;" so as to read:

In each year, for the period of five years from the 1st day of January, 1896.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us understand this measure. How are the expenses to be paid? Will the Senator from Alabama explain the joint resolution?

Mr. PUGH. The expenses are to be paid by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COCKRELL. Janitor service, and everything?

Mr. PUGH. Everything. The United States is freed from any expenses whatever.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the joint resolution as amended be read. It is very brief.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That full permission be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of Pennsylvania and to the superior court of said State to occupy the United States court room and the rooms connected therewith at Scranton, in the county of Lackawanna, during the month of January, and at Williamsport, in the county of Lycoming, during the month of February, in each year, for the period of five years from the 1st day of January, 1896, for the purpose of holding the sessions of said court therein, and that during said period concurrent jurisdiction, so far as is necessary, over said property be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the State of Pennsylvania for said purposes, so that the sessions of said courts in said buildings and rooms may be, during said period, fully legalized: Provided, That the commissioners of each of said counties of Lackawanna and Lycoming shall pay to the United States each the sum of $100 per annum for the use of said rooms for the time aforesaid: And provided further, That said rooms shall be kept in good repair at the expense of the State of Pennsylvania, and that said commissioners shall further provide necessary light and heat for said rooms at their own expense, and at the end of said period of five years the use of said rooms shall be relinquished to the United States by the said State of Pennsylvania and the said superior court in as good condition as before the occupancy of said rooms by said court.

Provided further, That the sessions of said superior court shall in no way interfere with the sessions of the said circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government is to be paid at the rate of $100 year?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir; $100 per annum for five years.

Mr. COCKRELL. The rooms to be occupied one month each year, or two months?

Mr. PUGH. They will occupy the court-house until the State provides rooms for holding the court. The commissioners are required to provide the rooms until the legislature shall make provision for holding the court. It is said that it may take five years' time and it may take less, but during the years the court is held in the United States building the commissioners will pay $100 per annum.

Mr. QUAY. It is really $100 a month that will be paid, for the room is to be occupied but one month in the year under the terms of the joint resolution. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Missouri, the necessity for the passage of the joint resolution. The State of Pennsylvania last year created a new court, for which there are no accommodations. Under the act of assembly the court is required to meet at these specific places, where the United States has buildings with court rooms which are not in use at the time when the State of Pennsylvania will need them for its court; and it is merely desired that the United States shall permit the use of its court rooms for the purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the joint resolution be so amended as to state what the Senator says, that $100 shall be paid for and during the month of such occupation.

Mr. QUAY. It is really $100 a month that is to be paid.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that in the way the joint resolution reads it will beyond question be interpreted to be at the rate of $100 a year, which would be a little over $8 for one month.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest, to remove the objection of the Senator from Missouri, which does not strike me with the force it strikes him, that the joint resolution be amended so as to read "shall pay each the sum of $500, to be paid in five yearly payments." That means the same thing.

Mr. QUAY. That amendment is unobjectionable.

Mr. HOAR. Then, in line 18, after the word "each," I move to strike out the words "the sum of $100 per annum" and insert "the sum of $500, to be paid in five yearly payments."

Mr. CULLOM. For the use of the building for one month each year?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on the Judiciary report to strike out the preamble. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the preamble.

The amendment was agreed to.

He also introduced a bill (S. 632) granting a pension to Thomas Glynn; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 633) granting a pension to Hannah G. Huff; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 634) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Gabriel Le Breton Deschapelles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 635) for the relief of Albert E. Redstone; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 636) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Chamberlain, in Brule County, and Lyman County, in the State of South Dakota; which was read twice by its title; and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 637) granting a pension to George M. Brooks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 638) granting an increase of pension to John Nichols; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 639) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also introduced a bill (S. 640) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 641) to promote Commodore Louis C. Sartori, now on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on said list, in accordance with his original position on the Navy Register; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 642) for the relief of Commodore Oscar C. Badger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 643) for the relief of William R. Steinmetz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 644) to refund certain import duties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 645) granting a pension to Ezra J. Riggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 646) for the relief of Francis Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 647) granting a pension to Edmund C. Bailey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 648) for the relief of Albert J. Pratt, administrator; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 649) granting a pension to Elizabeth Moore English; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 650) to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 651) granting a pension to Jane L. Buckingham; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 652) for the relief of Nancy E. Day, administratrix of the estate of James L. Day, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 653) for the relief of C. W. Michaels; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 654) to prevent citizens of the United States from soliciting or receiving and accepting titles, patents of nobility, or degrees of honor from foreign nations, and for other purposes; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the bill be read at length and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill was read the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act citizens of the United States of America shall be prohibited from soliciting or receiving and accepting titles, patents of nobility, or degrees of honor from any foreign government or representative thereof; and any such citizen who shall solicit or receive and accept any such title, patent of nobility, or degree of honor from any foreign government or representative thereof shall by that fact become disfranchised: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any ecclesiastical organization from conferring titles or degrees of honor on its members.

SEC. 2. That any citizen of the United States who shall solicit, or receive and accept, any title, patent of nobility, or degree of honor, from any foreign government or representative thereof shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by disfranchisement, and be deprived of the privilege of holding office under the Government of the United States and under the government of any State or Territory in the United States, and be adjudged to pay a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 and be committed to prison at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years and shall pay the costs of prosecution.

SEC. 3. Any person violating the provisions of this act by soliciting, or receiving and accepting any title, patent of nobility, or degree of honor, herein prohibited, from any foreign government or representative thereof may be indicted and tried in any State or United States court of general criminal jurisdiction in any court or district in which the offense may have been committed, or in which he may be found or be arrested.

Mr. CALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 655) to amend the laws granting patents to inventors and for the condemnation of inventions for the public use; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also introduced a bill (S. 656) appropriating $125,000 for the construction of a light-house tender for the Gulf coast of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 657) to provide for the erection of range lights at St. Josephs Bay, Florida, and at St. Andrews Bay, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 658) to place the improvement of the harbors of Fernandina, Pensacola, St. Johns River, and other places in Florida under contract, and making appropriations therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 659) to provide for the erection of a public building at Ocala, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 660) to provide for making conduits in Washington and the District of Columbia, and for better and cheaper lights and electric appliances; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 661) to amend section 2880 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing time for vessels to unlade; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 662) for the relief of William S. Grant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin introduced a bill (S. 663) to remove the charge of desertion against Philip Pflueger, late of Company G, Twenty-fourth Wisconsin Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 664) to remove the charge of desertion against Joseph Riese, alias Julius Rosier, late of Company D, Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 665) to confer the rank and pay of a first lieutenant of infantry upon the director of gymnastics and instructor in swordsmanship at the United States Military Academy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 666) to amend section 4829 of the United States Revised Statutes concerning surgeons, assistant surgeons, and other medical officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 667) for the relief of Wilbur F. McCue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALTHALL introduced a bill (S. 668) for the relief of William T. Robertson, administrator of Ira A. Sprouse, deceased, late of Scott County, State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 669) for the relief of Henry C. Nichols, of Marshall County, State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 670) for the relief of John C. Bailey, administrator of Andrew Nichols, of Marshall County, State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 671) for the relief of John C. Bailey, of Marshall County, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 672) for the relief of George C. Harper, of Scott County, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 673) granting a pension to Joseph R. West, brigadier and brevet major general, United States Army Volunteers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The proposed beneficiary of this bill was long a member of this body and has a most excellent record as a soldier, having been an officer not only in the Mexican war, but in the late war of the rebellion. He is now in very indigent circumstances, and by reason of bodily infirmity he is unable to do any work whatever. For these reasons I ask the Committee on Pensions, when organized, to give the bill early attention.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VILAS introduced a bill (S. 674) for the relief of Jennie M. Hunt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 675) to amend section 34 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 676) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1895; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PASCO introduced a bill (S. 677) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 678) for the relief of Agnes and Maria De Leon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SQUIRE. I introduce a bill, and wish to make a brief explanation regarding it. It provides for the establishment of a gun factory on the Pacific Coast for the manufacture of heavy guns and other ordnance for the use of the Army. It also provides for the appointment of a board, to consist of three officers of the Army, to examine and report what is the most suitable site for the erection of such a plant as is provided for by the bill.

I wish to state that a similar bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Coast Defenses several years ago, and that in the fortifications appropriation act of 1892 an appropriation was made of $2,500 for the payment of the expenses of a board, to consist of three officers of the Army and three officers of the Navy, to select a suitable site for a gun factory to be established on the Pacific Coast. Upon inquiry at the War Department I have ascertained that up to this time no such board has been appointed, and it is probable that the appropriation which was made in 1892 is not now available. It is quite possible that the delay has occurred partly on account of the mixed character of the proposed board. At the time of the appropriation it was supposed that the Navy Department might also be interested in the manufacture of large guns on the Pacific Coast. In the present bill the latter is not contemplated, and it is deemed by the officers connected with the War Department that there is now no necessity to have a board to consist partly of officers of the Army and partly of officers of the Navy; that it will be sufficient to have officers of the Army alone on such a board; furthermore, that it is not necessary that there should be a distinct appropriation for this purpose, as the expenses of the board to be created under the terms of this bill, if it become a law, being only traveling expenses, can be paid as usual out of the funds appropriated in the general appropriation bill for the Army for this purpose.

With this explanation I introduce the bill, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The bill (S. 679) to provide for the establishment of a gun factory for the finishing and assembling of heavy ordnance on the Pacific Coast was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. HANSBROUGH introduced a bill (S. 680) for the relief of James Linskey from the operation of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 681) for the relief of William H. Beck, assignee of A. Burwell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. QUAY. I ask that the joint resolution may lie on the table for the present; and I shall request the Senate, by unanimous consent, to pass it at the conclusion of the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 18) to authorize the purchase of the painting by Victor Nehlig, representing Pocahontas saving the life of Capt. John Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF RAILROADS.

Mr. BRICE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the annual report of the Commissioner of Railroads, for the year 1895, 1,500 extra copies, in paper covers, with appendixes, for the use of the Commissioner of Railroads.

CRIPPLE CREEK DISTRICT, COLORADO.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, at the earliest day practicable, 5,000 copies in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," constituting pages 1 to 209 of part 2 of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with the accompanying illustrations, of which 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey.

IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN L. WALLER.

Mr. BAKER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all information which has been received by him or by the State Department in regard to the arrest and trial of John L. Waller, a citizen of the United States, by French authorities in the Island of Madagascar, and his imprisonment in Paris, in the Republic of France, including all correspondence between Edward Telfair Wetter, United States consul at Madagascar, and Mr. Edwin F. Uhl, of the Department of State, and all records, documents, and evidence in any way touching said matters in his possession or in possession of the State Department.

INDIAN RIVER CANAL, FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is directed to send to the Senate any information the Department may have as to the condition of the canal on Indian River authorized to be built by the State of Florida, and whether it is in the tide waters of the United States, subject to its admiralty jurisdiction; whether any work has been done upon it or is now being done upon it. The Secretary of War is further directed, if such information is not on file in the War Department, to order the officers of the Engineer Corps on duty in Florida to report to him the facts in relation to the subject of this resolution, and submit the same to the Senate as soon as it may be received.

STATUES OF JOHN STARK AND DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound of the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statues of the late John Stark and Daniel Webster 15,000 additional copies, of which 5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, concerning this resolution I simply desire to say that the calls for the document referred to are very frequent and pressing. It is a valuable historical document, and I trust that the Committee on Printing, to which I desire the resolution to go, may take a favorable view of the resolution and report it back promptly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing, in the absence of objection.

SPECIAL REPORT OF LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MILLS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 500 copies of Senate Document No. 7, being a special report of the Librarian of Congress, be printed, one-half of said number to be for distribution by the Librarian.

CUSTODY OF MINOR CHILDREN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into and ascertain what is the existing law in the District of Columbia in relation to the custody of minor children, and especially to ascertain whether, under the law as it now stands in said District, the father of any minor children may dispose of their custody after his death by provisions in his last will and testament. Said committee is instructed to report the result of its investigation to the Senate, and its conclusions thereupon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I venture to call the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to the importance of an early investigation into this question. I do not know anything about the facts of the controversy in the courts of the District of Columbia, which has occupied the newspapers for some time past, but I do know that it seems intolerable to me that we should live longer under any system of law or any decision or any common law which authorizes any father of children in his last will and testament to dispose entirely of the custody of those children after he shall have passed from the earth; and I hope the committee will take this subject up at an early day and report its conclusions to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Maine that questions such as this have heretofore invariably gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and not to the Judiciary Committee. Of course I have no pride of opinion about it, nor any particular desire as to where the resolution shall go, but if the precedents of the past are to be followed the resolution ought to be addressed to the Committee on the District of Columbia instead of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. Neither have I any wish about the matter as to which committee the resolution shall go. It is a pure question of law. It has been claimed in the courts, with considerable asseveration and emphasis, that under the common law, which is applied to this District and government in certain respects, the father of minor children may absolutely dispose of their custody, ousting perhaps their mother after his death. Whether or not that be the law I do not know. I look upon it as a pure matter of law for the law committee of the Senate to investigate. It is true the question appertains to the District of Columbia alone in location, and being simply an investigation into a law question, and not a question of the government of the District, nor the administration of the government in the District, I indicated the Committee on the Judiciary. I am willing that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], representing those two committees, shall settle as to which committee the resolution shall go. I only wish that it shall be looked into and seen if we have any such relic of barbaric law in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly am indifferent personally as to where the resolution may go. While it is purely a question of law, it is purely a question of law of this particular locality, of this District. Such questions have uniformly heretofore gone to the District Committee. I shall not make it the subject of a motion. I have fully performed what I conceive to be my duty in making the suggestion I have made to the Senator from Maine and to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the resolution being so referred.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think the practice of the Senate has invariably been since I have been here to refer all questions affecting the jurisprudence of the District of Columbia to the Committee on the District, whether they be pure questions of jurisprudence or not. The various codifications of the laws relating to the District, which have been proposed from time to time on particular subjects, have always come from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The members of that committee give hearings, which the Committee on the Judiciary never does, to the citizens of the District of Columbia, who are in the habit of communicating for a thousand purposes with the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the members of that committee are necessarily obliged, in the course of their duties, to have a familiarity with the laws applicable here which the members of the Judiciary Committee never get. So I would suggest the amendment which has been proposed, that the resolution go to the Committee on the District, from whom it is likely to get a quicker report than from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE. Let the resolution be modified by striking out "the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting "the Committee on the District of Columbia." I am entirely content with that.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, without entering into the discussion of the appropriate committee to which this resolution should be referred, I simply want to state my objection to passing any resolution in regard to a case now pending in the courts of this District. The question as to the right of a father to dispose of the custody or guardianship of his infant or minor children is one of the questions at issue in that case, whether the common law of England applies to this District now in that regard. That case, which has been reported in the newspapers here, excites a vast amount of feeling; it is being litigated now in the courts of the District, and for the Senate of the United States directly or indirectly to take any part in that litigation is bad practice, and I for one must enter my dissent to the passage of such a resolution.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, it is a question as to which committee properly has jurisdiction to deal with the subject-matter of the resolution. It is immaterial to either of the committees which shall take charge of the matter, but it seems to me that the judiciary system of this District and the jurisdiction of the courts of this District are matters to be investigated and reported upon by the Committee on the Judiciary.

This is a purely legal question, and I fully concur with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has just stated, that any report that either committee should make upon this question would have no legal effect whatever and could not influence the action of the courts now having jurisdiction of this identical question. The question stated in that resolution is a pure matter of law arising in a case pending in the courts, and of which the courts now have jurisdiction. For the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on the District of Columbia now to report the conclusion to which they may come upon that purely abstract question of law would amount to nothing whatever in legal effect. It might be persuasive with the court and it might be that the conclusion of this law committee, made up of Senators whose profession is that of the law, and who had devoted their lives to the study of the law, would have influence with the court, but as an authority merely.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri that such action ought not to be called for on the part of any committee of the Senate, because it can have no other effect than that which I have stated. But if the Senate wants a committee to report upon this purely abstract legal proposition, which is already pending in the courts, and over which they already have jurisdiction, if it is desired to have as an authority the opinion of the Judiciary Committee or of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to be acted upon and sanctioned by the Senate, I do not think that there is any question but that the proper committee to take charge of it is the Judiciary Committee. But I object to any such subject-matter being referred to any committee of the Senate, because, as I have stated, any action upon it can have no legal effect whatever in the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine and also the attention of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and of Senators generally to the fact that this very question was before the Judiciary Committee at the last Congress by a bill introduced on the subject, which was partially considered in the Judiciary Committee by a subcommittee, but owing to the fact of its being a short session of Congress and the press of business no final conclusion was reached upon it by the committee.

It is a matter, I agree, of very great importance and one that ought to be considered carefully by some committee. There should be, in my judgment, soms legislation on the subject.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, Senators entirely mistake the scope of the resolution. It is not intended, and ought not to be intended, and could not be intended, as a matter of law to in any way affect any case that is now pending; but Senators know that much valuable and important legislation is frequently passed by legislative bodies because certain cases which have arisen have called attention to the necessity for new laws. I disclaimed in introducing the resolution any knowledge of the case that has been referred to in the courts; I have not even read the reports of the testimony; I know nothing about it and care nothing about it; but I have seen that it is alleged in the presentation of that case that the existing law in the District of Columbia authorizes the father of minor children by his will and testament to absolutely dispose of the custody of those children after his death. I say that is intolerable if that be the law, and the proper law committee, either the District Committee or the Judiciary Committee, ought to inquire and see if it is the law, and, if so, report a new statute, which can in no regard influence the case that is now pending.

I agree with the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Missouri that nothing that we can do can affect the pending case, or ought to affect it; but when we have discovered that there has been slumbering some relic of barbarity in the law applicable to this District I agree with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] that it is so important a matter that any committee might be glad to take charge of it, and whatever the Senate concludes upon a report shall be the law hereafter, can not relate back, refer to, or control in the least the present case. I do not see that anyone ought to object to this resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to the resolution, but I wish to reaffirm my dissent from the suggestion of the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. PUGH].

If it be true that because this is a pure question of law it should go to the Judiciary Committee, it follows that wherever in relation to a subject to be dealt with by any other committee of the Senate a pure question of law arises that also must go to the Judiciary Committee. It is presumed that all the members of this body, whether they have been practicing lawyers or not, understand the laws of the country for which they are to make laws, and whose laws they are to amend and repeal and reenact from time to time; and in the division of subjects among different committees it has been always the custom of the Senate to take it for granted that every committee was able to deal with the legislation which related to its particular subject. If a law be proposed which purely affects the agriculture of the country, the Committee on Agriculture reports it, whether it be purely legal or not. So of the Navy, and so of the Army. If a bill relating to the jurisprudence of the District of Columbia went to the Judiciary Committee last year it was by inadvertence, as I conceive, and not in accordance with the uniform precedents of the Senate.

The District of Columbia is a little government by itself. It has its own special laws, partly coming from laws established from time to time by Congress, and very largely inherited from the State of Maryland, of which the cities of Washington and Georgetown were once a part. Laws relating purely and simply to the punishment of larceny in the District of Columbia, the puishment of offenses in the highway, nuisances in the highway, the regulation of sales by merchants or by peddlers, all that class of laws which require criminal legislation, and all laws relating to the descent of estates in the District of Columbia, which are civil in their nature, have always been the subject of study and investigation by the Committee on the District of Columbia. The members of the Committee on the District of Columbia are learned upon that particular subject, and if this resolution goes to the Committee on the Judiciary, it seems to me, we shall not only be taking from the Committee on the District of Columbia a large part of its proper jurisdiction, but by the same logic we shall have to take from every other committee of the Senate a large part of its proper jurisdiction.

Mr. HALE. I have modified the resolution by striking out "the Committee on the Judiciary" and inserting "the Committee on the District of Columbia."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

BISCAYNE BAY AND PALM BEACH, FLORIDA.

Mr. PASCO. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] this morning introduced a joint resolution with reference to the improvement of Biscayne Bay. That Senator is in his seat, and I ask him if there is any objection to that joint resolution being taken up and acted upon at the present time? It is based upon a report from the War Department; and if there be no objection, I ask that it be immediately considered.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection, and I should be very glad if the Senator from Florida would call up the joint resolution, as it is properly within his jurisdiction.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $1,500 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for a survey and plans for the improvement of the entrance to Biscayne Bay, Florida, as recommended by the Chief of Engineers in his letter of February 26, 1895, and for a survey and plans for the construction of a breakwater at Palm Beach, Florida; and the Secretary of War is directed to report the result of such surveys, together with plans and estimates for contemplated improvements, to Congress at the earliest practicable moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONTHLY STATEMENT OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution from the House of Representatives in relation to the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, was read twice by its title.

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago I introduced a bill similar to the joint resolution which has just been read, and as I desire to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, I shall make a very brief statement concerning it.

The difficulty arises from an omission or a mistake in the printing act passed last January. Prior to that time the Departments had authority to order printing done, but that act restricted them to 1,000 copies. I understand that the Treasury Department has used its 1,000 copies of this publication and is in want of more, while no member of the Senate or House of Representatives has a single copy of the document to send to his constituents, and the calls for it are very numerous. It is a very important document, and the action contemplated has been recommended by the Public Printer.

I will state that I have consulted with the leading members of the Finance Committee on both sides of the Chamber, and they think we ought to pass the joint resolution at once. The matter is all stereotyped, and I understand the October statement is now about ready to go to press. As I have stated, there are a great many calls for the document, and I trust there will be no objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether 3,500 is the number which was previously printed?

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that was the number. However, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I think the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to have any number printed that he chose to call for.

Mr. COCKRELL. He has not that authority under the present printing act.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that was the number. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury has been consulted in regard to the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. The power to print beyond a certain number is limited under the general law, and it cuts down the Departments about one-half to two-thirds of the number they were accustomed to have printed theretofore. The only question, in my opinion, is whether 3,500 copies will be sufficient.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I am correct in saying that this is substantially the same number that was formerly printed.

Mr. GORMAN rose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very likely the Senator from Maryland can give us that information.

Mr. GORMAN. I can not state definitely. I suggest, however, that the delay of a day will not make any material difference, and that the joint resolution had better be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. GORMAN. I think there is some merit in this case, but we are constantly appealed to by the Departments for an increase of printing, and it is almost impossible to do it unless we repeal the present law. I trust that the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so referred in the absence of objection.

FUR-SEAL FISHERY CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN. If there is no further morning business to be presented I desire to call up the resolution which I submitted last week, and, with the consent of the Senate, will make some remarks on it at this time. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Alabama, which will be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 3d instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the President received by the Senate on 13th February, 1895, and his message read in the Senate to-day, relating to the payment by the United States of the claims of Great Britain arising out of the Bering Sea controversy, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instruction that said committee examine into the question of such liability to Great Britain and the amount thereof, if any, and of any liability on the part of Great Britain or Canada arising out of said controversy; and that said committee shall have authority to report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I find that recent events, to which I will refer on this occasion, impose on me the personal duty, as well as the duty that rests upon me as a Senator, a member of the Tribunal of Arbitration which sat in Paris in 1893, and as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to reply to certain statements, strictures, and criticisms sent out through the American press by the British Government touching the attitude of Congress toward what is called the Bering Sea controversy.

I will not undertake to cover the whole ground of this dispute until a complete examination is made necessary by the adoption of the resolution now before the Senate, if it is adopted, but will endeavor to put the Senate in possession of the leading facts involved in the scope of that inquiry, and that should cause us at once to enter upon the proposed investigation.

The questions presented in this dispute are broad enough and plain enough to be decided without resort to hair-splitting analysis or merely artful methods of discussion, and I will endeavor to examine them in that view. The question whether a negotiation respecting the liability of the United States to Great Britain for the seizure of sealing vessels in Bering Sea under the orders of Mr. Cleveland's first Administration shall take place, or should have taken place, under the treaty of February 29, 1892, is still an open question, and has not been closed by any part or feature of the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration. On the contrary, as I shall presently proceed to show, that tribunal expressly refused to make any decision of the question of such liability or that the seizure of the vessels under Mr. Cleveland's order was illegal.

Article VIII of the treaty, relating to the question of damages for those seizures, is as follows:

VIII.

The high contracting parties having found themselves unable to agree upon a reference which shall include the question of the liability of each for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the other, or by its citizens, in connection with the claims presented and urged by it, and being solicitous that this subordinate question should not interrupt or longer delay the submission and determination of the main questions, do agree that either may submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in said claims and ask for a finding thereon, the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiations.

Articles VI and VII of the treaty are as follows:

ARTICLE VI.

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators it is agreed that the following five points shall be submitted to them, in order that their award shall embrace a distinct decision upon each of said five points, to wit:

First. What exclusive jurisdiction in the sea now known as the Bering Sea and what exclusive rights in the seal fisheries therein did Russia assert and exercise prior and up to the time of the cession of Alaska to the United States?

Second. How far were these claims of jurisdiction as to the seal fisheries recognized and conceded by Great Britain?

Third. Was the body of water now known as the Bering Sea included in the phrase "Pacific Ocean," as used in the treaty of 1825 between Great Britain and Russia, and what rights, if any, in the Bering Sea were held and exclusively exercised by Russia after said treaty?

Fourth. Did not all the rights of Russia as to jurisdiction and as to the seal fisheries in Bering Sea east of the water boundary in the treaty between the United States and Russia of the 30th March, 1867, pass unimpaired to the United States under that treaty?

Fifth. Has the United States any right—if so, what right of protection or property in the fur seals frequenting the islands of the United States in Bering Sea when such seals are found outside the ordinary 3-mile limit?

ARTICLE VII.

If the determination of the foregoing questions as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States shall leave the subject in such a position that the concurrence of Great Britain is necessary to the establishment of regulations for the proper protection and preservation of the fur seals in or habitually resorting to the Bering Sea, the arbitrators shall then determine what concurrent regulations outside the jurisdictional limits of the respective Governments are necessary, and over what waters such regulations should extend; and to aid them in that determination the report of a joint commission, to be appointed by the respective Governments, shall be laid before them, with such other evidence as either Government may submit.

The high contracting parties furthermore agree to cooperate in securing the adhesion of other powers to such regulations.

The part of the award which relates to the question of liability for damages in our dealings with those sealing vessels is as follows:

AWARD AND DECLARATIONS.

Findings of fact proposed by the agent of Great Britain and agreed to and approved by the agent for the United States, and submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration for its consideration.

1. That the several searches and seizures, whether of ships or goods, and the several arrests of masters and crews, respectively mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case, pages 1 to 60, inclusive, were made by the authority of the United States Government. The questions as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States, have been withdrawn from and have not been considered by the tribunal, it being understood that it is open to the United States to raise these questions, or any of them, if they think fit, in any future negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay the amounts mentioned in the schedule to the British Case.

2. That the seizures aforesaid, with the exception of the Pathfinder, seized at Neah Bay, were made in Bering Sea at the distances from shore mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto, marked C.

3. That the said several searches and seizures of vessels were made by public armed vessels of the United States, the commanders of which had, at the several times when they were made, from the executive department of the Government of the United States, instructions, a copy of one of which is annexed hereto, marked A, and that the others were, in all substantial respects, the same; that in all the instances in which proceedings were had in the district courts of the United States resulting in condemnation, such proceedings were begun by the filing of libels, a copy of one of which is annexed hereto, marked B, and that the libels in the other proceedings were in all substantial respects the same; that the alleged acts or offenses for which said several searches and seizures were made were in each case done or committed in Bering Sea at the distances from shore aforesaid, and that in each case in which sentence of condemnation was passed, except in those cases when the vessels were released after condemnation, the seizure was adopted by the Government of the United States, and in those cases in which the vessels were released the seizure was made by the authority of the United States; that the said fines and imprisonments were for alleged breaches of the municipal laws of the United States, which alleged breaches were wholly committed in Bering Sea at the distances from the shore aforesaid.

4. That the several orders mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto and marked C, warning vessels to leave or not to enter Bering Sea, were made by public armed vessels of the United States, the commanders of which had, at the several times when they were given, like instructions as mentioned in finding 3, and that the vessels so warned were engaged in sealing or prosecuting voyages for that purpose, and that such action was adopted by the Government of the United States.

5. That the district courts of the United States in which any proceedings were had or taken for the purpose of condemning any vessel seized, as mentioned in the schedule to the case of Great Britain, pages 1 to 60, inclusive, had all the jurisdiction and powers of courts of admiralty, including the prize jurisdiction, but that in each case the sentence pronounced by the court was based upon the grounds set forth in the libel.

It is the plain, palpable, and unmistakable fact, of which the text and context of these papers admit of no doubt or sincere question, that the Tribunal of Arbitration did not attempt, directly or indirectly, to consider or decide any question of the liability of the United States for those sealing vessels seized by order of the President, or the amount of damages incurred under such seizures, or whether such damages, if so incurred, were due to British subjects or to American citizens. This fact was stated to our Government in the report of our agent, Hon. John W. Foster, to Secretary Gresham, August 17, 1893, from which I quote:

It will be seen from the decision of the tribunal that a finding of facts, agreed upon by counsel, was rendered in accordance with Article VIII of the treaty. This finding will be found to relate entirely to the facts of the seizures and, as agreed to by counsel, did not in any manner involve the question of liability or the value or ownership of the vessels.

The tribunal obeyed the mandate of the treaty under which it existed, and expressly refused to consider any of those matters, and remanded their consideration to the further negotiations of the treaty powers as original questions, which they never had any right to deal with.

Great Britain, however, contends that the Tribunal of Arbitration considered and decided this question of liability as a necessary inference from one feature in the record, which was itself a collateral question, and did not control or concern the real question before that body, the protection and preservation of the Alaskan seal herd.

If the President had sent to the Senate the diplomatic agreement made by him with Great Britain, in which a committal to the British contention is sought to be apparently avoided by a compromise, but is in fact admitted without reserve or qualification, the vote of this body would have settled the attitude of the country by accepting or rejecting that agreement. If Congress should thereafter appropriate the coveted "lump sum" to satisfy the British demand, we would at least have been free from the humiliating attitude of accepting and indorsing a falsehood as the decision of the Tribunal of Arbitration, and of paying citizens of the United States for criminal wrongs done to their country.

The reassertion by the President of the justice and rightfulness of the demand of the British Government made upon the United States with the insulting arrogance of an ultimatum, requires of Congress that its refusal at its last session to vote the lump sum of $425,000 to satisfy this demand should be defended upon the principles and facts that justified that vote.

For reasons of the gravest character, the Senate has a special duty to perform on this occasion, in the assertion of its rightful and undeniable constitutional power of passing upon and accepting or rejecting all diplomatic agreements with foreign Governments that the President may make.

It is a wise and indispensable provision of the organic law that the President can not act alone, or with any other body except the Senate, in any way to bind the United States in an executory covenant with a foreign power. I will never consent, whatever may be his opinion of or relations to the Senate or to Senators, that the President shall confine the consideration of such matters to the legislative powers of the Senate or Congress, thereby ignoring the treaty-making powers of this body.

It is this palpable departure from the requirements of the Constitution that makes it incumbent on the Senate to make the investigation proposed in the resolution I have offered. The arbitration treaty of February 29, 1892, is the supreme law of the land, and is mandatory upon Congress and the President, and it is his duty and ours to obey and execute it. If Congress votes to execute the agreement between the President and Great Britain by appropriating the $425,000, it will do so merely in the exercise of the power of appropriation, but it can not confirm that executory diplomatic agreement until it has been ratified by the Senate.

I will now proceed to discuss the merits of that agreement and some other matters connected with it.

The controlling fact and the key to the situation which results from the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration made at Paris is this: That Great Britain and the United States agreed that it was to the mutual interest of both nations, and was a mutual duty of humanity, and was for the advantage of legitimate commerce, and a proper subject for the friendly cooperation of all the maritime powers that security and proper protection should be given to the Alaskan seal herd through the exercise of all just powers of government, whether the same might be rightfully exerted by the United States alone or by the concurrent action of the two treaty powers under regulations to be established by a tribunal of arbitration. With this mutual purpose in mind, it at once is obvious that, as to the care to be exercised in the preservation of the Alaskan fur seals, there was no controversy between these nations, and as to the best and most efficient method of preserving them from destruction there was no controversy or dispute, the decision of which could possibly result in an award by the arbitrators in favor of one Government against the other. There was no national dispute whether one method of preserving the seals was wiser or better than another. If a method worse than some other that was suggested had been adopted by the tribunal, both Governments would have had cause to complain that their joint purpose had not been adequately executed.

The Tribunal of Arbitration by the agreement of the treaty powers was discharged from the duty of considering the questions of the damages suffered by either for acts done during the period covered by the modus vivendi of 1891 and that of 1892 incorporated in the treaty of arbitration.

This joint action removed from the tribunal the only questions upon which it was possible that an award could be predicated in favor of one Government against the other.

The questions that remained for the consideration of the arbitrators had no reference to any claim for damages by either Government against the other, or any liability for such damages, if any had been sustained. These matters were expressly excluded by the treaty from the consideration or award of the arbitrators.

This left for the consideration of the arbitrators the question which had been discussed at great length by the two Governments, whether the power and right to protect and preserve the Alaskan seals belonged to the United States exclusively, or whether it was necessary, as between them, that the protection of the seals should be accomplished under regulations in which the two Governments would concur, and would make obligatory upon their citizens or subjects through independent but parallel legislation, and through further joint or concurrent national regulation in execution of the award.

It was the contention of the United States that the separate and exclusive power to protect and preserve the seals of the Alaskan herd existed in that Government, unaided and unobstructed by the subjects or the Government of Great Britain.

This claim of the United States was formulated in five points or propositions in the treaty of arbitration, upon each of which the tribunal was required to render a separate decision.

These five points I have quoted from the treaty.

It is manifest that some of these questions are purely historical, one of them is geographical, and others are either questions of law or mixed questions of law and fact. A variety of functions other than juridical were thus imposed upon the Tribunal of Arbitration, and these separate decisions demanded, each in its turn, the exercise of these distinctive offices by the arbitrators.

The laws of usage, custom, prescription, and of the construction of treaties, as well as public and private international law, and Russia relating to these questions, as well as alleged precedents from other States, were cited, argued, and urged before the Tribunal of Arbitration in support of the opposing contentions on all of these five questions.

These questions were special and were germane only to the particular issues stated in the treaty and submitted to the tribunal. They could have no effect except as between the two Governments, and with reference only to the matters stated in the submission, which fixed the limits of the powers and jurisdiction of the Tribunal of Arbitration. As decisions of principles of justice and equity, or of the law of nations, the awards of the arbitrators have no effect beyond the special matter submitted to them, and no other nation is bound to respect them.

Neither Great Britain nor the United States is bound to adhere to these decisions in a controversy with any other power.

The Tribunal of Arbitration, by a majority vote, decided four of these questions adversely to the contention of the United States. If either of these four questions had been decided in favor of the contention of the United States, the question would have arisen in a form that would have been seriously embarrassing, whether the Tribunal of Arbitration had the power to proceed to establish any concurrent regulations for the protection and preservation of the Alaskan seals, for the reason that such a decision would have established the right of the United States in Bering Sea in the one case and on the Pacific Ocean in the other case to enforce the protection and preservation of the seals through her own sovereign powers without regard to or in defiance of any opposition by Great Britain.

This was the purpose and effect of the contention of the United States, and only this, in the five points stated in Article VI of the treaty.

Those decisions denied to the United States the exclusive right of exercising sovereign power over the Alaskan seals outside the 3-mile limit, and equally to Great Britain, if such a right had been claimed by that Government.

But these decisions did not dispose of the matters submitted to the arbitrators by the treaty.

On the contrary, those decisions made it expressly incumbent and mandatory upon the arbitrators that they should consider and establish (ordain) general concurrent regulations for the proper protection and preservation of the Alaskan seals, binding upon both Governments, to which, also, they should jointly invite the accession of other powers.

In performing this duty it is manifest that no judicial action was required and that no controversy between the treaty powers was submitted to them, or was required to be settled by the Tribunal of Arbitration.

This field of duty was opened to the tribunal by those decisions, and the United States and Great Britain met, without further disagreement, on the common ground of their earnestly professed and proclaimed desire and purpose of providing for the protection and preservation of the Alaskan fur seals.

The questions then remaining for consideration were not formulated in the treaty further than that the regulations must be concurrent—that is, they must bind each country, mutually, to enforce them by legislation and by special regulations—and must be necessary to give proper protection and to secure preservation to the Alaskan fur seals on the high seas (including Bering Sea) outside the 3-mile limit of either country.

These duties of ordination of concurrent regulations, thus free from restrictions as to their form or requirements, were very broad in their scope, and were exceedingly delicate and difficult of satisfactory performance. The function of the Tribunal of Arbitration in this new rôle was not judicial, nor did it include any matter of controversy submitted to them for their award. It was more akin to the powers of diplomacy, supported by authority to make a conclusive agreement and, by a quasi legislative power, to ordain rules that should bind two great sovereign powers; but the tribunal had no power to enforce its award, and it rested alone on the sanctions that constitute the binding force of treaties.

Under such conditions, the concurrent regulations established by that tribunal can only be treated, in any legal or obligatory sense, as if they had been included in the text of the treaty of arbitration, and had been signed and ratified by the treaty powers.

Both Governments are as much bound to enforce the concurrent regulations established by the Tribunal of Arbitration as if they had been incorporated in the treaty, and they are not bound by the award to any other extent.

This view of the matter was discussed by the tribunal, and no dissent to it was expressed during their deliberations.

Thus it appears that the Tribunal of Arbitration had no right or opportunity to consider any question of loss or damage that either Government may have claimed against the other growing out of any incident connected with this protracted fur-seal controversy. If any decision made by the tribunal has any effect upon any such claim for damages, it is not the effect that follows the adjudication of the same question between the same parties, or the establishment the common law of England and the United States, the civil law, the Code Napoleon, the municipal laws of England and the United States, and of many British provinces, many decisions of courts in England and the United States and other countries, and all the diplomatic correspondence of Great Britain, the United States, of a rule or principle of law by a court of general jurisdiction and of authoritative utterance. At most, the award of the arbitrators, adversely to the United States on either of the five questions stated in Article VI of the treaty can only furnish a remote argument in support of the legal justice of the claim of Great Britain for damages on account of the seizure of vessels in Bering Sea. It is perfectly obvious that there is no reasonable pretension that the liability of the United States is res adjudicata.

It is equally clear that the Tribunal of Arbitration could not and did not attempt to settle any question of law between the two Governments that related to a liability for damages that was not submitted to them, but was expressly withheld from them by the treaty; nor could they establish a principle of law by their decision that related to any other controversy not submitted to them or that could possibly settle by inference a question or controversy by relation back to a period anterior to the time of their existence as a Tribunal of Arbitration. If there is any rule of law that is perfectly settled it is that the award of an arbitrator is not a judgment unless it is made such by statute, and that it is limited to the precise matter contained in the submission and is not authority in any other controversy between the parties to the arbitration.

I am bound by and am faithfully loyal to the award of the tribunal, although I voted with the minority on four of the five questions that were decided adversely to the contention of the United States, and on the first of those questions I voted alone. In its full legal and moral force and effect I adhere to the award, and will so vote, in any emergency, but its effect as law is being conveniently overstated and misapplied by Great Britain, and its moral effect, as well as its positive requirements, are being either ignored or perverted by that Government.

Nothing could be made more certain in statement than the following declarations of the Tribunal of Arbitration, that their award was made without any reference to any question or claim for damages by either Government against the other. I quote from the award:

And whereas, by Article VIII of the said treaty, after reciting that the high contracting parties had found themselves unable to agree upon a reference which would include the question of the liability of each for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the other, or by its citizens in connection with the claims presented and urged by it, and that "they were solicitous that this subordinate question should not interrupt or longer delay the submission and determination of the main questions," the high contracting parties agreed that "either of them might submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in said claims and ask for a finding thereon, the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiation."

I quote further from the agreement as to a state of facts made by the Governments and adopted by the Tribunal of Arbitration, as follows:

The questions as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States, have been withdrawn from and have not been considered by the tribunal, it being understood that it is open to the United States to raise these questions, or any of them, if they think fit, in any future negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay the amounts mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case.

In further support of the fact that the award of the tribunal excluded, absolutely, all consideration of the question of the legality of the seizure of these twenty fishing vessels, I quote from a paper entitled "Correspondence respecting claims for compensation on account of seizure of British vessels in Bering Sea by United States cruisers, presented to both houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty, September, 1895." This official paper (which I hold in my hand) has been circulated among newspapers in the United States by the British ambassador as a political "flyer" or circular, with the evident purpose of reaching the people, instead of the Congress, in order to get a popular prejudgment which would enable Great Britain to escape from a negotiation respecting these claims that would expose her want of justice and would compel her to prove the alleged facts on which they rest. I will further notice this paper before I yield the floor. In this official document Sir Julian Pauncefote makes the following quotation from a remark made from the bench by Lord Hannen, a distinguished jurist, while sitting in the Tribunal of Arbitration as one of the British arbitrators.

Lord Hannen, addressing Mr. Phelps, said:

We will assume for a moment that the finding [of the tribunal] will be no property.

If that can be tacked onto the finding of facts as to the seizure, then that would meet that which Sir Charles has been asking for, a finding that it was an illegal seizure, and if so, I presume that would satisfy his requirements, as undoubtedly it would meet the view which I intended to indicate in the question I put to you.

This question was put to Mr. Phelps while he was replying to the demand of Sir Charles Russell that the tribunal should rule that the seizure of the twenty vessels was illegal.

The award, which I have just quoted, shows that the tribunal expressly refused to hold that those seizures were illegal. It is needless to produce further evidence to satisfy any impartial mind of the entire absence of a rational or just ground for the position taken by Sir Julian Pauncefote in his dispatch (No. 42) of March 15, 1895, to Earl Kimberley, in which he says:

On these two points I would observe that no admission of liability became necessary from the moment that the Paris Tribunal, by its award, had rejected the legal pretensions of the United States to a special property in the fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands. That decision at once proclaimed the illegality of the seizures and the liability of the United States to satisfy the claims. That was the basis of the diplomatic negotiation for the adjustment of the claims, and I am at a loss to conceive what other view could be taken without disputing the Paris award.

I am equally at a loss to conceive how the tribunal should refuse to consider the question of the liability of either Government to the other, being prohibited by the treaty from any such attempt, and how by such refusal they have managed to decide the question and give to their judgment the effect of an estoppel by matter of record. Being urged by the British counsel to decide that the seizure of these vessels was illegal, they expressly refused to consider the request, and yet the British ambassador permits himself to state the absurd conclusion as a fact that "that decision at once proclaimed the illegality of the seizures and the liability of the United States to satisfy the claims." What claims, I ask, were thus finally adjudicated by the refusal of the arbitrators to consider the question of the liability of either Government upon any claims asserted by the other? For the present I will leave Sir Julian at leisure for the repair of his logic, having first aided, as far as I can, his powers of comprehension, of which he justly complains in his diplomatic circular to the people of the United States, from which I quote the following paragraph:

Nor can I comprehend, without further explanation, the meaning of Senator MORGAN'S objection to that negotiation as not having taken place "through the constitutional authorities of the United States."

Referring to the proposed negotiation, if Sir Julian had remembered that there was no negotiation of the question of liability, or as to the rightfulness or justice, or the items of the claims or the amount of them, or whether they belonged to citizens of the United States, he would have comprehended my objection, in part at least, to the diversion of this question from the consideration of the Senate, without which no negotiation can mature into the effect of law. He would have seen, as he doubtless saw, very clearly that a conditional agreement for a "lump sum" of $425,000 in compromise of all claims was a convenient way to avoid a negotiation required by treaty, instead of its being a diplomatic negotiation, which the Senate must ratify by a vote of two-thirds of a quorum before it is an engagement that binds the United States.

The Senate is an essential part of "the constitutional authorities of the United States," without whose consent, as Sir Julian perfectly understands, no executory agreement with a foreign power can be valid under our Constitution. The Senate has constitutional powers to examine and revise negotiations with foreign governments, which are a part of the permanent foundations of the Government of the United States. The arrangement for a "lump sum," provided Congress would consent to vote it, and for a negotiation for a joint commission, if Congress should refuse, was not a diplomatic agreement concluded or negotiated "through the constitutional authorities of the United States" compatible with the dignity of either Government, and its injurious effects are obvious in the irascible and censorious criticisms of our people and their representatives in Congress, with which the intrusive circular of the British ambassador abounds. The failure to drive Congress into making a "lump sum" appropriation as a compromise of these claims, which were neither proven nor discussed, so far as Congress was informed, is made the pretext of the statement of the British ambassador that Congress has refused to meet "the national obligations of the United States." He makes an analysis of the vote in the House of Representatives on the rejection of the "lump sum," and informs Earl Kimberley that it was "Republicans, Populists, and 48 Democrats," and upon that basis he says in his dispatch of February 28, 1895, that—

Strong party feeling would seem alone to account for the rejection of so just and desirable an arrangement, and, as your lordship will have noticed from the inclosures in my dispatch, statements have been made in Congress which are entirely misleading.

It is getting to be a familiar method of arraignment of our national policy when it is disappointing to British demands and interests, however unsatisfactory they may be to our country, to attribute our action to the influence of party politics. In this instance Sir Julian Pauncefote does not hesitate to impute to the action of the House of Representatives, in an unjust and offensive manner, this motive of party antagonism as the reason for the failure of his "lump-sum" adjustment of the claims of his Government. He cites in support of his assertion the fact that the "Republicans, Populists, and 48 Democrats" voted against the appropriation.

The Administration earnestly urged the appropriation, and the inference is wholly unsustained that the 48 Democrats whose votes were necessary to defeat the "lump-sum" appropriation were influenced by party considerations. To the reverse, they feel a deep regret that they could not vote for the recommendation of the President. Not satisfied with this form of accusation, Sir Julian arraigns Senators and Members of the House of Representatives by name, and indulges in offensive comment upon matters uttered in debate, and charges them with ignorance and misstatements of law and facts, and imputes to them discreditable motives and the use of epithets when commenting upon the conduct of American citizens in their unlawful and flagrant violations of duty to their own country, its laws and policy, under the cover of the British flag. In one instance of several in which he assumes the rôle of vindicator of the acts and reputation of these men, in a gratuitous and insulting manner he says in his letter to Earl Kimberley (page 32):

But of all the unfounded objections which have been urged against these claims, that which seems to have made the greatest impression on the public mind is the statement that most of the vessels on behalf of which the claims were made were in fact owned by persons whom Senator MORGAN stigmatized in the Senate as "recalcitrant and rascally Americans who hired themselves out to the British flag to rob the Government of the United States and to violate its laws and dishonor the country." (See my dispatch of the 4th instant.)

These vituperative epithets are quite unmerited, and I will proceed to show that the objection in question is not well founded in fact and apparently is based on a mistaken view of the British navigation laws.

It never occurred to me to examine the British navigation laws to ascertain whether they justified our citizens in violating the laws of the United States. I would as soon think of looking into the Koran for excuses for violating the Christian decalogue. Sir Julian should cite us to higher authority than the British navigation laws for the justification of crime against the laws of the United States. What control has Great Britain in Bering Sea through her navigation laws more than the United States has with her criminal statutes; and how can British statutes in those waters have force and sway to excuse crimes against the United States committed by her own citizens?

He objects to the term "rascally" as it was employed in debate by me to characterize this offense, of close kin to piracy, when I applied it to this surreptitious maraud upon the revenues, property, and laws of the United States. I make due allowance for this irritation of Sir Julian, because he was bound to vindicate this treasonable conduct of our citizens as the only means left to him of excusing the indulgence given to them under the British flag. I am stating this very mildly. I might well say that his Government is particeps criminis. The facts on which my comments are based are stated in the counter case of the United States, submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration, with full proofs to support them, in part, as follows:

It is further insisted on the part of the United States that the steam schooners Thornton, Grace, Anna Beck, and Dolphin, and the schooners Sayward, Carolena Pathfinder, Alfred Adams, Black Diamond, and Lily, for the seizure of which claims for damage are made, were at the time of their seizure owned, in whole or in part, by citizens of the United States, and that therefore no claim for damages can be urged in their behalf by Great Britain; that the steam schooners Thornton, Grace, Anna Beck, and Dolphin, and one-half of the schooner Sayward were owned by one Joseph Boscowitz, a citizen of the United States; that James Douglas Warren, in whose name the claim is made as to the steam schooner Thornton, had no real interest therein; but that the same was mortgaged to her full value to Joseph Boscowitz, who was in fact the real owner; and that Thomas H. Cooper, in whose name the claims growing out of the seizure of the schooners Grace, Dolphin, and Anna Beck are made, had in fact no interest therein, and has in no respect been damnified or sustained loss by the seizures thereof, either as owner of these schooners and steam schooners, their outfits, or their catches, the same being mortgaged to their full value to Joseph Boscowitz, above referred to, and having been conveyed to Thomas H. Cooper, without consideration, for the sole purpose of giving them a registry as British vessels.

It is also insisted by the United States that the schooners Carolena and Pathfinder were in fact at the time of their seizure owned by one A. J. Bechtel, then a citizen of the United States, and that William Munsie and Frederick Carne, in whose names the claims for damages growing out of the seizure of these schooners are made, had in fact no interest in the schooners, or their outfits and catches; that the schooners Alfred Adams, Black Diamond, and Lily, for the seizure of which claims are made in the schedule, were in fact at the time they were seized owned by one A. Frank, who was then a citizen of the United States; that Gutman, in whose name the schooner Alfred Adams was registered, was not the actual owner of the schooner, her outfit or catch, but, on the contrary, that the said schooner, her outfit, and catch were owned by said Frank; that after the release of the Alfred Adams from seizure her name was changed to Lily, in behalf of which damages are also claimed in the schedule, she remaining the property of A. Frank, and he alone being interested in her outfit and catch, and not Morris Moss, in whose name the last-mentioned claim is presented; and that said Frank was also the owner of the schooner Black Diamond, her outfit and catch, and that he was the real person who sustained damage or loss by reason of the seizures of the Alfred Adams, Lily, and Black Diamond.

All these objections and contentions, thus formally presented by the United States, were withdrawn from the tribunal to be determined by "further negotiations." The British agent selected certain undisputed facts as to the vessels that were seized or warned off from Bering Sea, and agreed with the agent of the United States as to the names of those vessels and the times and places of the seizures and warnings. This agreement was adopted and certified by the tribunal—this and nothing more—and all other facts as to the claims for damages were left undecided and unconsidered by the tribunal, and so was the question of liability.

I will again allude to this subject in a different connection in the course of my remarks. These assertions have not been disproved; on the contrary, they have been established in the mouths of many witnesses. They are too real to give encouragement to Great Britain to enter upon a negotiation that would establish them in fact and in law.

These questions were not decided in the award of the arbitrators, either directly or by any remote inference. The treaty excluded from them expressly the power to decide them. Neither have they been the subject of negotiation, as is expressly required by the treaty, and my objection to the tacit admission of their validity by the Senate took the form of a resolution to have them examined into by a committee, so that Congress could deal with them intelligently. I still demand the evidence at the hazard of giving further offense to the British ambassador and of again being reprimanded by him for doing injustice to our American citizens.

I have no fault to find with the British ambassador for any opinion he may entertain of my conduct as a Senator, or as an arbitrator, nor do I censure him for freely expressing those opinions to his own Government. That is his privilege, and he has the rightful choice of the language best suited to his tastes in making such communications; only that he is still responsible at the bar of public opinion for his motives and for the verity of his statements and the fairness of his deductions.

But the British ambassador has no right to question a member of Congress for words spoken in debate, by printing, under cover of a privileged communication to his own Government, a diatribe of criticism and invective upon his utterances in Congress, and then pursue the extraordinary method of handing out those diplomatic papers to the American press for publication and comment, thus forestalling a reply with an unjust statement.

I do not know whether this paper, which was handed out to the press in Washington by the ambassador, has been sent in to our State Department by the British Government. If it has, it is probable that it will be laid before Congress with some note of approval or disapproval by the President. I do not know, or suppose, that the President will join Great Britain in these severe comments upon the opinions of members of Congress expressed in debate, although they voted against his recommendation of this "lump-sum" appropriation. His criticisms, if he has any to make, will come from a source that is responsible to the country along with the Senate for our treaty relations, and along with Congress for our legislation. It will have none of the intrusive arrogance that has induced the British ambassador to attempt to influence our legislation by harsh denunciation of our votes and arguments, and by taking an appeal to our people against the attitude of their representatives in Congress, and supporting it by flattering allusions to their superior sense of fairness and justice.

His manifest aversion to negotiation and his persistent purpose to escape it will lead the American people, to whom he appeals, to a very careful and sincere inquiry into the motive that causes the concealment of the real merits of these claims from scrutiny, by grouping them into an indistinguishable mass, and covering them with a "lump-sum" appropriation. This policy was clearly indicated in Sir Julian's letter to Mr. Gresham, of June 7, 1894, in which he says:

In view of the decision of the tribunal on the questions submitted to them it only remains to assess the damages. I am accordingly authorized by the Earl of Kimberley to propose that, for the purpose of such assessment, each Government should appoint a duly qualified commissioner, who should be a lawyer, and, if possible, possess some knowledge of the conditions of the seal industry.

The position of the British Government thus formulated excluded all negotiation as to the liability of the United States upon the British claims, in whole or in part. It excluded negotiation and objection in respect of the validity of the claims made on behalf of citizens of the United States. It excused Great Britain from submitting any statement or proof even of the new items injected into their account, and confined the proposed commissioners to an examination and report "as to the amount of the damages." It also reversed the declaration of the treaty and of the Tribunal of Arbitration in making its award, that the question of liability for damages was reserved to be determined by further negotiations between the two Governments.

In reply to the demand of Congress that negotiation should bring to light the facts relating to the merits of each claim, and of our liability for each, Sir Julian, in his letter of March 15, 1895, says:

Senator MORGAN argues that the United States never agreed to arbitrate the question of their liability for damages, nor have they ever admitted their liability. They only agreed to negotiate respecting it, expressly reserving the question of such liability as the subject of such negotiation. The claim of Great Britain is, he states, based on the false assumption that the United States were bound by the award of the tribunal, or by agreement, or by law, justice, or equity to pay any part of the demand.

Sir Julian might have gone further and asserted that I contend, if the principles of the award are binding, as a treaty is binding, that the counter claim of the United States presented to the tribunal would more than set off all the damages claimed by Great Britain.

Sir Julian thus proceeds:

Senator MORGAN also insists that "the further negotiations" provided for by Article VIII of the Bering Sea arbitration treaty should take place "through the constitutional authorities of the United States."

He then comments as follows:

On these two points I would observe that no admission of liability became necessary from the moment that the Paris Tribunal, by its award, had rejected the legal pretensions of the United States to a special property in the fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands.

These assertions were obviously intended to disregard with contemptuous silence the requirements of the treaty and the express declarations of the tribunal in making its award, that a further negotiation should be had to determine the question of liability. I repeat, as Lord Hannen stated, and as the record proves, that the tribunal was urged by Sir Charles Russell, then attorney-general of Great Britain, to decide that the seizure of these vessels was illegal, and they refused to do so, or to consider the question.

Unless the seizure of these vessels was illegal, there is no ground for the claim of damages for their seizure, and the United States is not estopped from inquiring into the legality of the seizure by the award made upon the fifth point in Article VI of the treaty, as the question was not submitted to the tribunal whether the seizure was legal or illegal. Neither is it a conclusive inference, or a reasonable deduction from the principles of the law of nations, or of the entire award, or any part of it, that the seizure was illegal.

The tribunal did not attempt the absurd task of declaring that the United States could not, under the laws of nations, seize upon or disperse a fleet of sealing vessels in Bering Sea, and within 4 miles of the seal islands, sufficient in number to destroy the seal herd, and using firearms for that purpose. Nor did they decide that such conduct was made lawful by the fact that the United States, under the laws of nations, "has not any right of protection or property in the fur seals * * * when such seals are found outside the ordinary 3-mile limit." Neither was it decided by the tribunal that, as to Russia or China, or any other nation, the United States had no such right of property or protection. The award in that part, and in respect of each of the other five points submitted in Article VI of the treaty was, properly, a literal and direct answer to the question stated and submitted. It did not establish a rule of law or conduct even between the two Governments as to the right of seizure of vessels in the future or in the past.

"The right of property in the fur seals," which, it is contended by Great Britain, is limited to the distance of 3 miles from the shore and ceases when it is 10 feet beyond that limit, is an utter absurdity, and yet that is the right that the tribunal was called upon to decide, unless we admit that the "3-mile limit" is not applicable, according to the true construction of point 5 in Article VI of the treaty, to the right of property, but to the right "of protection."

The "right of protection" can only mean the right of the United States to protect the seals outside the ordinary 3-mile limit. This right was denied to the United States by the award, as a separate power of sovereignty, to be exercised to the same extent and for the same reasons, outside the 3-mile limit, that it might be exerted inside of that limit, which is the sea limit of its territorial jurisdiction.

The phrasing of this point in the submission is very confused and inaccurate, but the tribunal had to take it and decide it as it was stated in the submission. It was so decided, and the meaning of it is that the sole or exclusive sovereign power of the United States did not exist, outside the 3-mile limit, as to fur seals, so as to give that Government the exclusive right to protect them against the claim by citizens of other countries of the right to capture them.

Inside the 3-mile limit the award was entirely consistent with the idea that the United States had the perfect right of property in the seals found there, in virtue of its sovereignty over the territory in which they were found, or ratione soli; but that point was not submitted to the tribunal, and, consequently, the exclusive right of protecting them there was not decided by the tribunal, so that the award could only mean that the United States, while having the exclusive sovereign right to protect the seals inside the 3-mile limit, and that right was not disputed, had not such an exclusive or sovereign right to protect the seals outside that ocean limit of its territorial boundaries, that right having been decided against them. The question of the right of the United States to seize a vessel near its shores engaged in an immoral or injurious enterprise, as in the wanton destruction of a valuable article of commerce in a manner and to an extent that must result in its extermination, was not submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration, and was not decided.

That question and that right of seizure arises out of the depravity of the act and its manifest danger to the rights of commerce. It needs no special interest in the article of commerce so exposed to extermination and no exclusive sovereign power in a government to justify it in preventing such destructive work. The principles of private and public justice stand against such illicit conduct, and a nation may prevent it, as a man may prevent a public or private crime, just as piracy, or the slave trade, or mutiny at sea, or the willful wreck of a vessel, or the willful starvation of a ship's crew may be prevented by the seizure of the vessel.

No decision of the Tribunal of Arbitration was made that fixes a liability on the United States without regard to the attendant circumstances for seizing these vessels. It would not be contended by any respectable publicist that a nation or a mob could prevent the coming of immigrants to our shores who were found approaching our country on the high seas if they have the right under our laws to enter our ports. Whether they should come under a flag or without one, we could not permit their capture and their diversion from our shores; yet we could have no right of property in or perhaps no exclusive right of protection of such people. A seizure of a ship so interfering would be an act of public duty that the whole world would applaud.

It is the criminality or innocence of the act as to its dangerous tendency or results, and not the motive of it that justifies interference to prevent its perpetration.

The innocence of the marauds of the sealers is not established by the decision of a question of property in the seals, or of the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States to protect them. The Tribunal of Arbitration not only refused to find that the seizure of men and vessels thus engaged was illegal, but, in determining the essential part of their award, they recognized and virtually incorporated into the treaty principles and binding regulations that are a stern denunciation of the wrongful, inhuman, and destructive acts which compelled the President, as a necessity of national self-defense, to order the seizure of those vessels.

In 1868–1870 the United States adopted and afterwards matured by amendments a code of laws for the protection of fur seals within our dominion in Bering Sea, according to the water boundaries as fixed in our treaty with Russia. The Pribilof Islands were set apart as a special Government reservation for this purpose, and the privilege of killing fur seals was leased to a company at a certain annual rate and a royalty which yielded to the United States an important revenue. Severe penalties are denounced by these statutes against all persons for illegal sealing in Bering Sea. They have not been repealed and are in force unless the award of the Paris Tribunal, and the legislation to enforce it, has repealed or supplemented them. As to other nations than Great Britain, they are in force. The Paris Tribunal certainly did not repeal these laws, nor declare that the seizures made under them were illegal, or that the judgments of our courts rendered upon such seizures are null, or are reversed. Some "further negotiation" is needed to clear up these points, and a "lump sum" of damages is not the golden key that can unlock all these combinations.

Mr. Cleveland, in his first term, rightfully and courageously obeyed these laws, the last of which, and the most important, was approved by him on March 2, 1889. This act extended our laws for the protection of the seals over all the waters of Bering Sea within our dominion. The twenty vessels were seized, or warned, under his first Administration that are now the subject of controversy, and Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, in August, 1887, informed the British Government of his refusal to suspend the further seizure of guilty vessels pending the discussion of the legality of the seizure, and proceeded to seize others, only three of them having been then seized.

This forceful and patriotic action was justified by Mr. Bayard in notes to Mr. Vignaud and Mr. Phelps. Mr. Bayard's prophecy as to the destruction of the seals to the extent of their extermination is being painfully and rapidly realized.

Dr. Gigliogi, the director of the Zoological Museum, Royal Superior Institute of Florence, Italy, whose statement was laid before the tribunal, gave the following true and impartial account of the cause of the destruction of the Alaskan seals (Phelps's Argument, page 248):

Having conclusively shown that the lamented decrease in the herd of fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands can in no way be accounted for by the selective killing of nonbreeding males for commercial purposes which takes place on those islands under special rules and active surveillance, we must look elsewhere for its cause; and I can see it nowhere but in the indiscriminate slaughter, principally practiced on breeding or pregnant females, as most clearly shown in your condensed report, by pelagic sealers.

In any case, all who are competent in the matter will admit that no method of capture could be more uselessly destructive in the case of Pinnipedia than that called "pelagic sealing." Not only any kind of selection of the victims is impossible, but it is admitting much to assert that out of three destroyed one is secured and utilized, and this for obvious and well-known reasons. In the case of the North Pacific fur seal this mode of capture and destruction is doubly to be condemned, because the destruction falls nearly exclusively on those, the nursing or pregnant females, which ought on no account to be killed. It is greatly to be deplored that any civilized nation possessing fishery laws and regulations should allow such indiscriminate waste and destruction. The statistical data you give are painfully eloquent, and when we come to the conclusion that the 62,500 skins secured by pelagic sealing in 1891 represent at a minimum one-sixth of the fur seals destroyed, namely, 375,000—that is, calculating one in three secured, and each of the three suckling a pup or big with young—we most undoubtedly need not look elsewhere to account for the rapid decrease in the rookeries on the Pribilof Islands, and I quite agree with you in maintaining that unless the malpractice of pelagic sealing be prevented or greatly checked, both in the North Pacific and in the Bering Sea, the economic extermination of Callorhinus ursinus is merely the matter of a few years.

Mr. Phelps, in his argument before the Tribunal of Arbitration, presented tables, carefully calculated upon the lowest possible basis, that 250 female seals in 1,000 were killed each year. These tables show that in eighteen years—the life of a female seal—the killing of 250 female seals out of 1,000 the first year would diminish the herd by 2,117 seals. These statements are moderate estimates of the destruction of seal life by pelagic hunting in Bering Sea with nets and shotguns. The cruelty of this "huntsman's sport," as it is encouragingly stated in the British contention, almost defies description. Thousands upon thousands of the pups of slaughtered mothers have been left to starve on the shore by the wanton violation of the principles of commercial rights so clearly stated by Mr. Bayard and afterwards denounced by Mr. Blaine as a crime against humanity, contra bonos mores.

The tribunal did not decide that the United States had no right to protect the lives of the pups, starving on the shore, by arresting the cruel marauders who assembled outside the 3-mile limit and destroyed the mother seals as they went out for food and as they returned with paps filled with the only food on which they could subsist.

I venture to say, in justice to that honorable body, that such a question would have drawn forth a response that the marauders would never forget, and the Canadian Government would scarcely have quoted under the head of res adjudicata.

This identical question and others of even worse import, involving Canadian officials in the ownership or control of vessels employed in this nefarious work, are left open by the treaty and the award for exposure through negotiation which the treaty makes mandatory upon both Governments.

It is not the eagerness of the great and rich Government of Great Britain to "snap at" and gulp down $425,000 in a "lump sum" that causes this hesitancy and revolt at the negotiation provided for in the treaty. It is the unwillingness of that Government to have the attitude of the Canadians and of the citizens of the United States who furnished the outfit of these heartless sealers laid bare that urges it to close the doors of investigation with a "lump sum."

If the plea of a technical estoppel by the award of the tribunal can not avail Great Britain to close the doors to the truth and to exclude justice, equity, good morals, and friendly dealing from all consideration in the "further negotiations," it will be found that her claim to damages can not be sustained unless there is a principle of international law or morals that probibits a nation from preventing a wrong to its territory, its revenues, its property, and the support and peace of its people, even if it is committed with force and violence within a few yards of its boundaries. I have found no such declaration in the laws of nations, nor any such precedent in the usages of nations.

On the high seas, where every nation is a sovereign, the maxim is more important than it can be elsewhere that "you must so exercise your own rights as not to do injury to the rights of others."

The Canadians and their brokers of the criminal class in the United States are and have been the only enemies of the fur seals yet disclosed in modern history among civilized people; and they began their pelagic invasion of ruthless and indiscriminate slaughter in Bering Sea as soon as it passed from the guardianship of the Russian Bear to that of the American Eagle.

Before the treaty of cession, in 1867, Russia never found it necessary to resist any raid upon her seal herds in Bering Sea. But in 1868, and until we enacted laws in 1869 and 1870 to forbid it, the rush of seal hunters to that sea and upon the Pribilof Islands was so furious that humanity shudders at the sickening massacre that ensued and threatened the immediate extermination of the entire herd. Then was the time and opportunity for Great Britain to adopt the just principles of the concurrent regulations for which Mr. Bayard so urgently pleaded, and which the Paris award finally wrote into the treaty, if her purpose to protect and preserve the seals against her own subjects had been as strong and earnest as her professions were, that were often expressed by Sir Julian Pauncefote. I do not mean to undervalue the fact that the political relations of Great Britain with the people of British Columbia were shaky, and that she was under some difficulty in holding them in cordial allegiance; but it was done at too great expense when she constantly deprecated their conduct toward the United States and as constantly sheltered them under her flag.

Turning to the vital and practical features of the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration, we find, first, that its effect and the sanctions under which it becomes a law to both the treaty powers are the same as if the concurrent regulations had been written into the original text of the treaty of arbitration. On what are these "concurrent regulations," these ordinances, these determinations, based? The answer is, upon justice and equity to the treaty powers, with proper regard to the rights of other nations, and the purpose of providing for the proper protection and preservation of the Alaskan seals. Do not these principles relate back, at least to the time of the seizure of the twenty vessels by the United States, as effectually as the decision as to the right of property or protection in those seals, which is supposed to determine the question of the legality of such seizure? Is there any reason why one part of the award should relate to an anterior period and another part should not, when both relate to the admitted duty of each Government toward the other?

An answer in the present tense to a question in that tense, that the United States has no right of protection or property in fur seals outside the 3-mile limit, has no more reference to a right, at a previous time, than a decree that forbids everybody to hunt or kill fur seals within a zone of 60 miles around the Pribilof Islands has to the right to do this at a previous date. They are both statements of the law of comity, as between the parties, and not of the law of nations, and have their origin and binding force in the same decree, and both relate back to antecedent conditions if either does. They both cover the past and the future if either does, and are both of like authority in controlling the rights of the parties; otherwise the award is not full and complete in its effects. There is no escape from this category except to say that question of illegal seizure of these vessels and liability for such seizure was not submitted to the arbitrators for decision.

As questions of logical deduction they are of equal force, as rulings of law they are equally decisive if they alike entered into the conclusions of the arbitrators. But they did not, for the question of the illegality of the seizure of the vessels was not submitted to the arbitrators, while proper regulations for the protection and preservation of the fur seals, and their enforcement by law, was submitted in the broadest form to the tribunal.

They decided what was the right and duty of pelagic sealers under different conditions, and gave them not merely the force of legal declarations of principle, but the additional force of treaty engagements between the two Governments.

The duties they imposed upon these Governments and their citizens or subjects were founded on principles of justice, equity, and national comity which existed, and existing were obligatory from the time that the first British vessel took any seals within the 60-mile limit, or any seals by the use of guns, nets, or explosives within the dominion of the United States in Bering Sea.

They were not in force until the award put them in force, and neither was the denial of property in seals or the exclusive right of the United States to protect them in force until the award put them in force. In all respects, every part of the award is binding in the same degree and extent under the principles declared, the rights established, and the duties enjoined upon each Government.

When was it wrong in a national or personal sense to take seals within the 60-mile zone? It was always wrong, because it put in peril the existence of animals useful in commerce, and when the two Governments agreed, through the award of the tribunal, that the absolute prohibition was necessary to avert that evil, it was established that the practice was always wrong and not merely that it had become wrong after the date of the award. The award is, that the two Governments shall forbid their citizens and subjects, respectively, to kill, capture, or pursue at any time or in any manner whatever "the fur seals within a zone of 60 miles around the Pribilof Islands, inclusive of the territorial waters." This had been done by the United States under statutes which denounced and punished this practice as a crime.

Those statutes are renewed and Great Britain has promulgated similar laws. This is a concession by Great Britain, as much so as if it had been written in the treaty of arbitration, that the statutes of the United States had not violated any of her just rights of fishery within that zone. But aside from the effect of such an admission, the moral law which underlies all international law and is the foundation of every common national right and duty supports, as it also made necessary and incumbent upon Great Britain the duty of prohibiting pelagic sealing by her subjects within that 60-mile zone.

It can not be denied that these matters are the proper subjects of consideration in determining the question of the liability of the United States in seizing the six or eight ships that were arrested and warned off within the 60-mile zone while hunting for and destroying seals. A "lump-sum" compromise is no answer to the demand for such a negotiation, which is made imperative by the treaty of arbitration. And so of the question of hunting seals with firearms in the Bering Sea, which was never a justifiable pursuit, and was wastefully destructive of seal life, and dangerous to the peace on the high seas.

The concurrent regulations applying to seal hunting in Bering Sea is a codification, in treaty form and effect, of the unquestionable principles of equity, humanity, and national comity that had rightful application to the duties of both Governments, as they have been freely admitted in their correspondence at all times since the Canadian raid on the seals in Bering Sea began.

Mr. Bayard foresaw the real necessity, which, from the start, was unavoidable, of agreeing upon concurrent regulations for pelagic seal hunting, rather than leave such an irritating subject to the exclusive discretion of the United States. Under the broadest affirmation of such exclusive right, the exercise of the power adequate to its enforcement would have caused a state of semi-belligerency on the high seas, and especially in the Pacific Ocean.

On August 19, 1887, Mr. Bayard said, in an instruction to Mr. Vignaud, of which identical instructions were sent to our minister to Great Britain, Japan, Russia, and Sweden and Norway:

> Without raising any question as to the exceptional measures which the peculiar character of the property in question might justify this Government in taking, and without reference to any exceptional marine jurisdiction that might be claimed for that end, it is deemed advisable—and I am instructed by the President to inform you—to attain the desired end by international cooperation.
> It is well known that the unregulated and indiscriminate killing of seals in many parts of the world has driven them from place to place, and by breaking up their habitual resorts has greatly reduced their number.
> Under these circumstances, and in view of the common interest of all nations in preventing the indiscriminate destruction and consequent extermination of an animal which contributes so importantly to the commercial wealth and general use of mankind, you are hereby instructed to draw the attention of the Government to which you are accredited to the subject, and to invite it to enter into such an arrangement with the Government of the United States as will prevent the citizens of either country from killing seals in Bering Sea at such times and places and by such methods as at present are pursued, and which threaten the speedy extermination of those animals and consequent serious loss to mankind.

In this instruction Mr. Bayard stated broadly and fully the ground covered by the final award of the Tribunal of Arbitration; yet he proceeded to execute the laws of the United States that are still unrepealed, by the seizure of ships engaged in this destructive work.

On November 11, 1887, Lord Salisbury was interviewed by Mr. Phelps, who wrote to Mr. Bayard that "his lordship promptly acquiesced in this proposal," which was, "that by mutual agreement a code of regulations should be adopted for the preservation of the seals in Bering Sea from destruction at improper times and by improper means by the citizens of either country." The interference of Canada delayed the treaty for this code until February, 1892. In the meantime the Canadians had so far progressed with this work of destruction that the seals have been almost destroyed. They still pursue their prey with unrelenting greed, and there is only too much cause for the belief that they give no heed to the treaty or the award or to British statutes or regulations in their mercenary war upon the fur seals of the Alaskan herd.

This business has become a regular pursuit and is pushed across the Pacific Ocean to the seal islands and coasts of Russia and Japan.

While thus engaged they gain the assistance of the British ambassador in an attempt to collect a "lump sum" of $425,000 from the United States without the presentation of a fact, or a reason, or a principle of law to support their claim for damages, which is based upon their own wrongful warfare upon "an animal which contributes so importantly to the commercial wealth and general uses of mankind," and its "indiscriminate destruction and consequent extermination."

I said in the Senate that not a dollar of this demand was justly due. That is true, unless it is admitted as a principle of law that a man may claim damages for his own wrongful and wicked conduct. It is true, unless the declaration of Mr. Bayard in the letter to Mr. Vignaud, from which I have quoted, is untrue, and unless his letter to Mr. Phelps of February 7, 1888, is untrue, "that so deplorable a thing should not be allowed to occur." When a man is doing a deplorable thing that should not be allowed to occur, I do not know of any rule of moral or positive law that entitles him to damages for being prevented from continuing its perpetration.

The code of regulations finally came to condemn and prohibit this crime against the nations and against humanity, and its foundations were laid upon the declaration of Mr. Bayard and accepted by Lord Salisbury. It simply ordained the truth and justice upon which they placed the right, and they were made the law by international agreement. Truth and justice were not unknown or unfelt by Bayard and Salisbury when they agreed upon the doctrines of this code and defined its scope and purposes, and the action of the tribunal merely affirmed what they declared. It did not create any new rules, either of morals or law. What was true and just when that award was made was equally true and just when the President ordered the ships to be seized, and not a dollar of damages is due for that righteous act.

An interruption of voluntary immigration to America by any power, or any person, or the preventing of a return of mothers to their children, born upon our soil, would be resented by our Government with whatever force might be necessary. The return of the mother seal to her young is as voluntary and as instinctive, if not as intelligent, as that of a human mother to her offspring. Whatever may be the motive for slaying seals, or however lawful it may be as a pursuit on the high seas, if the method of sealing is necessarily indiscriminate, and necessarily results in slaying mother seals while providing food for their pups, nothing could be clearer than is our right to prevent such sealing near our seal islands in order to save the life of the pups upon them.

If we do not own the pups and the mother seals "when found outside the 3-mile limit," we certainly own them, ratione soli, while they are inside that limit, and to deny to us the only possible means of nurturing the young seals, or to render that means so precarious that 20,000 pups are left starving on our soil, is an assertion of a right of pelagic hunting or fishing that is too absurd a proposition to be swallowed even as a "lump sum," and should be too revolting to lie on the Christian stomach of the British ambassador. Such a situation, raising such a question, needs the air of open negotiation. It has not been even the subject of any negotiation.

The resolution of Hon. Mr. HITT, adopted by the House of Representatives on the 15th December, 1894, called upon the Secretary of State for "all correspondence, reports, and other documents, not heretofore made public, touching the payment by the United States of $425,000 to Great Britain for damages growing out of the controversy as to fur seals in Bering Sea or the seizure of British vessels engaged in taking seals in those waters." This resolution developed the fact that no negotiation had taken place touching the damages claimed by Great Britain beyond the presentation of the claim, much increased in items and amounts over the demand of Great Britain in the appendix to the case submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration, and the virtual admission by the Secretary of State that the entire demand was just and obligatory upon the United States, and that to avoid the delay and expense of having the damages assessed by a joint commission the President offered to pay it in a lump sum of $400,000 provided Congress would make the necessary appropriation.

In Executive Document No. 310, House of Representatives, Fifty-third Congress, third session, this "negotiation" is given out to Congress in a letter of Sir Julian Pauncefote to Mr. Gresham of June 7, 1894, answered by Mr. Gresham August 16, 1894, discussing a proposal for a commission to hear and determine the claims, and a letter of Mr. Gresham of August 21, 1894, proposing a compromise at $425,000, and a letter of Sir Julian Pauncefote of the same date accepting the offer. It was a judgment by default upon each item of the enlarged and distorted claims of Great Britain, in which new and totally inadmissible demands were made, not theretofore presented, rendered on August 21, and accepted in a "lump sum" of damages on the same day.

That is the whole of the correspondence, yet Sir Julian, in a note to Earl Kimberley, February 28, 1895, which he now hands out to the press of the United States, says:

> One speaker (in the House) represented the total amount of the claims to be only $542,000, whereas it was over $700,000. Another concluded, from the fact that the offer of the lump sum and its acceptance was approved in notes of the same date, that the offer was made without previous investigation and was instantly "snapped at" by Her Majesty's Government, whereas the compromise was the result of laborious investigations, which were carried on during the whole summer.

The evidence of laborious investigation submitted by Sir Julian to his own Government relates exclusively to the compromise, and is contained in two letters addressed to Mr. Gresham, in which no allusion is made to any item of the British account, and that submitted to Congress by Mr. Gresham consists of two letters without any objection or allusion to any item of the account. If this is the negotiation to which he refers—and it can be no other—it scarcely deserves the name of a pretext and gives no information as to the facts that constitute the British claims or of any defense to them. I am compelled to say that, upon the facts set forth, there was no negotiation about these claims.

Sir Julian may have labored over and wrestled with these claims in anguish of spirit while he spent a summer in their investigation, but how much time or labor did he or Mr. Gresham devote to negotiation? The record shows that no effort even was made to give to the United States the benefit of a line or word of negotiation. It remains true, upon the record, that Great Britain jumped to the conclusion that it was best to avoid negotiation, if it did not "snap at" the lump sum that was tendered in settlement of claims that had neither justice, law, nor morality to sustain them. If Sir Julian's blue book circular, sent out to the American people to influence public sentiment against Congress is true in its statement of facts, I will inform them that it conveys no impression that any negotiation of these claims was had.

I am reluctantly compelled, also, to state, from the record, that the following statement in the letter of Mr. Gresham to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated December 20, 1894, is seriously incorrect and misleading. He says, "Under this article (Article VIII of the treaty) the arbitrators unanimously found that a number of British sealing vessels were seized in Bering Sea or warned therefrom by cruisers of the United States on the days and at the places in the special finding mentioned, leaving for future determination the question as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or any of them, and the question whether the vessels mentioned in the schedule of the British Case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States." This statement and quotation is only a part and the least important part of the finding of the arbitrators.

I must quote it from the text of the award that there may be no mistake about this painfully serious matter. The text reads as follows:

> The questions as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the Schedule of the British Case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States, have been withdrawn from and have not been considered by the tribunal, it being understood that it is open to the United States to raise these questions, or any of them, if they think fit in any future negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay the amounts mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case.

From a comparison of these statements it will be seen that the questions of the ownership of the vessels and the liability of the United States for these claims were not decided by the tribunal, but were left, as the treaty required, open for future negotiation. The information thus given to Congress was misleading and made room for the assumption of the Secretary of State, in full accordance with the pretension of Great Britain, that the Tribunal of Arbitration had fully decided and settled the question of liability for all the British claims, leaving nothing for adjustment except the amount of the damages to be assessed against the United States.

This is not true, as a matter of fact, or according to the intention of the treaty of arbitration, as it expressly states, and it is not true as a deduction or conclusion from any principle of law or comity involved in the award of the tribunal. If the award is entitled to the benefit of the rules of construction that obtain in respect of all agreements, decisions, judgments, treaties, and transactions that dispose of the rights and impose duties on men and nations—that it should be considered in all its parts, as an entire decree—the alleged liability of the United States for these seizures, if it is covered by the principles of the award, must be decided against Great Britain.

That is my contention, and for this reason, and others that I will now proceed to state, I ask that the Senate will cause the facts to be investigated and laid before Congress. We have been asked to vote a lump sum of $425,000 as a placebo to Great Britain without any proof of the justice of the demand, or of its legal obligations beyond the assertion, which is shown to be false on the face of the award and of the treaty of arbitration, that the Paris Tribunal has conclusively fixed and decreed that the United States is liable for the demands set up by Great Britain in its case laid before the arbitrators.

That award can not be wrested and perverted into the approval of a barbarous and wicked line of conduct in the past which it is intended to suppress and punish in the future, nor to mulct the United States in damages for seizing vessels and men engaged in it as the only means that was then available to prevent an evil that seriously threatened the immediate destruction of property inside the 3-mile limit, that was set apart and protected by law as a source of revenue by our Government.

On March 1, 1895, seeing that our Government had not entered upon negotiations with reference to this matter of liability, but had assumed its existence as res adjudicata, I offered a resolution in the Senate, which I am now again presenting for consideration. It went to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as it might cause some expenditures. On the morning of the 4th day of March, when the Fifty-third Congress would expire at noon, that committee reported my resolution to the Senate favorably, with an amendment. The Senator from Delaware objected to its adoption, and it went over under the rules of the Senate.

On the 25th of February the House had voted down this appropriation by a vote, as Sir Julian Pauncefote stated to Earl Kimberley, of "Republicans, Populists, and 48 Democrats." Efforts were made to obtain its recommendation by an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill to be offered by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, which failed. While this was going on I was silent as to what I believed was a wrong to the country, because I hoped that some member of Congress who was not a member of the tribunal, and could, therefore, speak more impartially than I might be able to do, would examine into and explain the situation. This had been done in the House in a very satisfactory manner, and resulted in the defeat of the appropriation. I then felt that it was due to the President, to the Tribunal of Arbitration, to Congress, and the country, as well as to Great Britain, that the reasons should be authentically stated that caused the Congress to reject the recommendation of the President that his agreement with Great Britain should be ratified by act of Congress, instead of the proper "constitutional authorities of the United States"—the President and the Senate.

Not supposing that the British ambassador would appeal to our people against this action of Congress, I desired that the negotiation, which failed to materialize, should at least be supplemented by our statement of our reasons for refusing to execute the agreement. And, not having the fear of anybody before my eyes—not even that sense of timidity which must abash any true Democrat who ventures to differ with our President when he has made an agreement with a foreign government—my convictions led me to coincide with the 48 Democrats in the House and the Committee of Appropriations of the Senate in the belief that the President in his zeal for peace had gone too far and too fast in the purchase of that brief moment of repose from the clamorous demand of the mother of the horse leech who still cries, "Give, give," by agreeing to pay a "lump sum" of $425,000, and to confess that we were criminal violators of international law in trying to defend our property inside the 3-mile limit against marauders who warred upon it just across the line of that limit.

In this effort to make a brief statement of my views of these matters on the motion that I repeat to-day for an examination of the British demands, I seem to have given such offense to Sir Julian Pauncefote that he became quite impatient with me, and in representing what I said in the Senate to his Government, and through his Government to the American people, who are so honored with his esteem and confidence, he has omitted to quote me fairly, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows. If he was not the representative of a great foreign Government, or if he was the representative of our Government, I would be bold to say that he had garbled the record in his effort to make good his appeal against me to the American people.

As I attach no value to his opinions of my course as one of the arbitrators or as a Senator, I will not now read what I did say on the occasion he refers to in his letter of February 28, 1895. My remarks are set forth on pages 3139, 3140 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 2, 1895. When I presented to the Senate, in the closing moments of the Fifty-third Congress, the memorandum of the account, as I state it, and as it should be stated in our negotiation and answer demanded upon each item, after the question of our liability, if any, has been settled, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], for some reason which he considered just, objected to my request to have it printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and I had no time to ask a vote of the Senate on my request.

Sir Julian, finding some comfort in this incident, to which he is heartily welcome, in his circular to the American people, under cover of a letter to Earl Kimberley, thus draws their painful attention to the fact that he, "Mr. MORGAN, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations," as he accentuates my official relation to the Senate, in the same letter, "He requested leave to print this document in the RECORD as part of his speech, but leave was refused," thus placing me and the document under the ban of the Senate's displeasure by its refusal, while the only reprimand I have been conscious of was the objection of a single Senator, who probably felt that he wanted more time to look into the matter.

This paltry fling at me is not worth the time it takes to notice it, only that I again present that statement, and having the time, I will now read it and ask the Senate, through its committee, to have it thoroughly investigated. The President again declines to negotiate, as the treaty of arbitration requires him to do, and again withdraws this subject from diplomatic examination by "the constitutional authorities of the United States." He again asks Congress to ratify a diplomatic agreement made by him with a foreign government which disregards and violates the mandate of the treaty—the supreme law—made by and with the consent of the Senate, according to the Constitution. It only involves $450,000, which may be a cheap bargain, and, it is argued, is as nothing to a people who live on borrowed money, as many rich people do, and this small sum is scarcely worthy of attention when our prosperity, except as to finance and the fur seals, is so brilliant.

Yet I must insist that the maxim de minimis non curat lex does not apply to this case, but that our duty often finds its highest expression in matters that are inconsiderable as to the sum of money involved.

In this case it is a clear duty of the Senate to obstruct the Executive in his twice-repeated effort to ride down its constitutional prerogative to consider and determine whether it will advise and consent, as a Senate, that one treaty shall be set aside and its mandate disregarded, and another shall be made and ratified without its consent, by any other coordinate powers of the United States. In this view of the subject, if the sum involved were $425,000,000, instead of $425,000, the question would be no greater than it is, as a matter of constitutional law.

It is well, indeed it is imperative, as a matter of the preservation of the constitutional distribution of the powers of government among the coordinate departments that the President should not disregard the fact that the Senate is associated with him in every agreement or bargain he may essay to make with a foreign government in virtue of the constitutional powers of the Executive. This association, even if it is disagreeable to him, is still enjoined by the Constitution and can not be avoided by any subterfuge. This provision was placed in the Constitution to give the Senate a veto upon Executive action when dealing with foreign governments, as he possesses the power of veto upon the enactments of Congress. He must submit such agreements to the Senate for their advice and consent, and not to Congress, to be voted upon a general appropriation bill or ratified by a separate act. He has too much of political interest in such a measure, too much pride of opinion, too much of the lust of power as its motive to use his veto power upon the measure after it has passed both houses, at his own request, even if he should then find, as I insist is true as to this measure, that it is wrong, inexpedient, and unjust to the country, and that it commits us to the approval of demands that are based upon principles that are false in law and in morals, that violate our own declarations of right under the laws of nations, and are derogatory to our history and our honor, and condemns acts, that were right and dutiful in 1887 and are still right, ordered and performed by the first Administration of our President. The case is a very peculiar one, and gravely suggests that the Senate should not be deprived of its constitutional power because it may suit the present views of the President.

There is a matter that demands the consideration of this Government in respect of the amount of the claims presented to the Secretary of State by Sir Julian Pauncefote in his letter to Mr. Gresham, dated June 7, 1894. The claim then presented by Great Britain, including interest, and new claims for the Henrietta, Black Diamond, and the Ada, footed up $542,169.26. The claims set forth in the case of Great Britain submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration in a "Schedule of claims" appended to said case, with interest, amounted to $439,171.48, an increase between those dates of $102,997.78. In a letter to Earl Kimberley, Sir Julian says the claim of Great Britain is $700,000.

This increase included large sums for "legal expenses" and $62,847.12 for expenses of suit before Supreme Court. The case is a very peculiar one, and gravely suggests that the Senate should not be deprived of its constitutional powers, because it may suit the President's sense of duty, or propriety, to undo what he formerly did, and to admit, in the language of Lord Salisbury, that "the United States Government has inflicted an unwarranted wrong upon the subjects of Great Britain." If the President, who inflicted this alleged wrong, feels that it is his duty to repent of it, or to apologize for it, I must not become the keeper of his conscience, but I will not vote money for the purchase of a pardon from the real wrongdoer, who demands a reward for our preventing her own subjects from perpetrating further wrongs and outrages upon the United States. I hope I shall be excused from reading the "document" that Sir Julian Pauncefote says the Senate refused to allow me to print in the RECORD. I submit it as a part of my remarks.

BERING SEA SEIZURES AND DAMAGES CLAIMED THEREFOR BY GREAT BRITAIN.

Amount claimed by Great Britain with interest	$542,169.26
Amount proposed to be allowed by Secretary of State	425,000.00

The schedule of claims for each vessel contains an item designated variously as "probable catch," "balance of catch," "estimated balance of catch," etc. These are clearly prospective profits or speculative damages, and are all based on future and contingent events forming no basis of fact on which an equitable finding as to amount of damages could be predicated. They should not be allowed.

Similar claims were presented by the United States to the arbitrators of the Alabama claims in 1872 at Geneva, and in their decision they say: "And whereas prospective earnings can not properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of the opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head." (See Alabama Claims, Volume IV, page 53, Congressional publication.)

The amount of speculative damages claimed by Great Britain in the schedule submitted with the letter from the Secretary of State are as follows:

I.		II.
Carolena	$16,667.00	Onward	$16,667.00
Thornton	16,667.00	Favorite	7,000.00
W. P. Sayward	25,250.00	Ada	15,818.00
Grace	23,100.00	Juanita	9,424.00
Anna Beck	17,325.00	Triumph	19,424.00
Dolphin	24,750.00	Ariel	9,248.00
Alfred Adams	19,250.00	Kate	10,966.00
Pathfinder	15,264.50	Minnie	12,752.00
Black Diamond	16,192.00		101,293.00
Lily	14,136.00	Henrietta	10,098.00
	$188,601.50		111,391.00
			188,601.50
			299,992.50

Amount of British claim	$542,169.42
Amount of speculative damages	299,992.50
Amount of claim less such damages	242,176.92
Amount proposed to be allowed by the Secretary of State	425,000.00
Claim less speculative damages	252,176.92
Excess of proposed amount over actual claim	182,823.08

The above figures and comparisons are based entirely upon the supposition that every vessel included in the schedule of claims submitted by Sir Julian Pauncefote was owned by a British subject.

It appears, however, from the United States Counter Case submitted to the Bering Sea Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, that the ten vessels appearing in Column I above were owned in fact by citizens of the United States (page 130).

The following vessels, it appears, were owned in fact by one Joseph Boscowitz, and that Thomas H. Cooper, in whose name the vessels stood, had no interest therein. Cooper is a British subject and Boscowitz a citizen of the United States. As to proof of Boscowitz's citizenship, see United States Counter Case, pages 255, 314, 315, and 351; and as to Cooper's interest, see his examination, ibid, pages 321-325.

Vessels.	Amount of claim.
Thornton	$26,817.65
W. P. Sayward	118,957.12
Anna Beck	27,863.04
Dolphin	40,201.50
Amount of Boscowitz's claims	251,981.88

The Carolena and Pathfinder, as appears by the United States Counter Case, were owned by A. J. Bechtel, a citizen of the United States. As to proof of Bechtel's citizenship, see Counter Case, page 351.

Vessels.	Amount of claim.
Carolena	$24,313.01
Pathfinder, first claim	26,765.00
Pathfinder, second claim	2,000.00
Amount of Bechtel's claims	53,078.01

The Alfred Adams, Black Diamond, and Lily (which was the name given the Black Diamond after its seizure) were owned in fact by A. Frank, a citizen of the United States. As to proof of Frank's citizenship and the actual ownership of the vessels, see United States Counter Case, pages 351 and 352.

Vessels.	Amount of claim.
Alfred Adams	$20,433.00
Black Diamond	17,185.00
Lily	17,176.00
	54,794.00

Amounts of claims of citizens of the United States presented by Great Britain.

Boscowitz's claims	$251,981.88
Bechtel's claims	53,078.01
Frank's claims	54,794.00
	359,853.89
Total amount claimed by Great Britain	542,169.42
Total amount of claims of United States citizens presented	359,853.89
Balance resulting, being amount claimed by British owners	182,315.53
But of this amount claimed by British subjects speculative damages are included to the amount of (see Column II above)	111,391.00
Amount claimed by British subjects less speculative damages	70,924.53

The total amount of claims of British subjects which, it thus appears, could possibly be recovered amounts in all to $70,924.53. But even this sum, which is $471,244.89 less than the British claim presented, $354,075.47 less than the amount that the Secretary of State proposes to give in settlement, is undoubtedly excessive. Of that amount $34,635 is "personal claims," and in all probability some of these claimants are citizens of the United States or some other country, which could be established by investigation. Deducting the "personal claims" from $70,924.89, there is left $36,289.89. Sixteen thousand five hundred and sixty dollars of this sum appears as the claim of the Henrietta (less speculative damages). The Henrietta was seized in Bering Sea in September, 1892, under the provisions of the modus vivendi, and therefore no claim is allowable; but even if allowable it shows its "padded" character from the fact that there is a claim for an "estimated catch" in Bering Sea when sealing was not allowed there and the season was over at the time of the seizure.

Whatever balance remains is made up of the cost of the vessels, outfits, insurance, legal expenses, etc. There are many items undoubtedly excessive and should be absolutely proved before being allowed.

However, on the supposition that the amounts claimed by British subjects are correct in all their items, the schedule of claims appears as follows:

Vessel.	Amount claimed.	Speculative damages.	Claim less such damages.	Total amount of claim, with interest at 7 per cent to July or August, 1895.
Onward	$23,269.71	$16,667.00	$6,602.71	$10,762.42
Favorite	7,000.00	7,000.00
Ada	26,518.00	15,818.00	10,700.00	16,592.00
Juanita	14,695.00	9,424.00	5,271.00	7,484.32
Triumph	19,674.00	19,424.00	250.00	355.00
Ariel	9,498.00	9,248.00	250.00	355.00
Kate	11,210.00	10,960.00	250.00	355.00
Minnie	16,460.00	12,752.00	4,708.00	6,685.36
	128,324.71	101,293.00	27,031.71	42,589.10
Henrietta (if allowed)	26,658.00	10,098.00	16,560.00	18,878.40
Total	154,982.71	111,391.00	43,591.71	61,467.50

Personal claims (if all claimants are British subjects)	$34,635.00
Amount due, with interest, to probable date of payment	96,102.50
Amount claimed by Great Britain, not including interest	542,169.26
Amount due, including interest	96,102.50
Excess of claim without interest over amount due with interest	446,066.76
Amount proposed to be allowed by the Secretary of State	425,000.00
Amount due, including interest	96,102.50
Excess of Secretary's allowance over amount due with interest	328,897.50

Undoubtedly this excess would be found to be still greater if the claims were thoroughly investigated and examined judicially.

It will be seen from Appendix No. 1 to my remarks that a claim for more than $60,000 is set up for legal expenses in our Supreme Court in the case of the United States in re seizure of W. P. Sayward. Unless the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration dealt with and reversed the judgments in these cases rendered by our courts it can not possibly be claimed that such award decided the liability of the United States for these costs and legal expenses. I have not yet heard that anyone has contended for that absurdity as being res adjudicata under the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration. Then, in this new batch of claims that were presented to the Secretary of State in June, 1894, there are many items for "illegal arrest and imprisonment" amounting to $18,000, and others for "sufferings and losses in navigating four vessels from Unalaska to Sitka," amounting to $13,635.

The nature of the sufferings and the items of the losses sustained by these marauders in navigating their vessels 300 miles or less, from Unalaska to Sitka, are not given. Whether they were suffering from overburdened conscience, or wounded national pride, or disappointment at the loss of their prey and their sport in the massacre of the mother seals and the starvation of their 20,000 pups is not stated.

That sort of raiding was solemnly denounced and prohibited by the tribunal, but if, through the misfortune of a misconception of the meaning of the plainest possible language, they decided that conduct to be a lawful claim for damages against the United States, it is at least proper that Congress should put the blame upon the tribunal, and it is indispensable, in view of the new importance that is given to the doctrine of estoppel, that Congress should protest very earnestly against the doctrines which otherwise would be fastened upon us by voting a "lump sum" in payment for these supposed tortures.

The British policy that seeks to escape from the direct force of truth, justice, and right by resorting to the doctrines of estoppel, acquiescence, and prescription, which has grown into a national diplomatic characteristic and is being felt in many quarters of the earth among the weaker nations, needs the vigilance of constant question and protest to prevent its crystallization into determined aggression and assertion of absolute right.

The boundaries of the British Empire have thus eaten into the smaller nationalities, until many of them have been absorbed into the realm; and we need to be cautious and alert on sea and on land in matters that relate to fur seals and gold, and to the observance of treaties and boundaries in Alaska. Inasmuch as the Administration gives us no information on which Congress can give an intelligent vote on the demand for "a lump sum," which is based only upon the ground of estoppel by judgment, we should at least state the reasons that control us in voting for or against the demanded appropriation.

If, as the British ambassador informs the people of the United States, Congress voted down this appropriation under a mistake of facts and principles, and in the heat of party politics, caused in part by my observations in the Senate, which were not made until many days after the House had refused the "lump sum," let us examine into the facts, which are still withheld from us, while our action is persistently demanded, and lay them before the country with the courage of honest conviction. Whether they shall sustain or condemn the course that Congress has seen fit to pursue, we are compelled to take action upon this subject, and we must act intelligently.

Two matters have failed to have the scrutiny of negotiation, and scrutiny is the most essential purpose of negotiation about international claims, that we can not afford to pass over in silent indifference, as has been done by our diplomatic agents.

I refer to the claims of the United States against Great Britain with reference to the fur-seal controversy, and the fact that is scarcely disputed that ten of the twenty vessels seized by the United States belonged to American citizens to the extent that they will receive a very large share of the "lump sum" (at least half of it) for their losses and sufferings in the violation of the laws of the United States under the shelter of the British flag. As to both of these matters, I refer with absolute confidence to the argument of Judge Blodgett submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration, which I lay before the Senate, and ask to have printed as a part of my remarks. (See Appendix 2.)

It has not been answered by anyone, and can not be successfully answered. When it was presented to the tribunal the British counsel saw that it was not safe to attempt an answer, and they only claimed a finding of facts upon matters that neither party disputed, that is, upon the names of the vessels seized and the times and places of the seizures.

I will, with the leave of the Senate, place it on the record as part of my remarks, that the world may know how the power of truth drove Great Britain from the field of negotiation in respect of these claims, and compelled Sir Julian Pauncefote and Lord Salisbury to intrench themselves behind the plea of estoppel and res adjudicata, which forbid the speaking of the truth in the contentions of men and nations.

I have no need to attempt to strengthen the statements and arguments of Judge Blodgett, that demand the full investigation of the claims, which, if allowed, will pay Americans who demand them, in the names of British subjects, for crimes committed through their infamous conspiracy under the shelter of the British flag.

A full and fair negotiation of these respective claims of the two Governments would have resulted in a large allowance of damages to the lessees of the seal islands, and consequent revenue to the United States, for the wanton waste of seal life by the methods of the British seal hunters, contrary to international duty and comity and the laws that regulate fishing on the high seas, near the shores, and contrary to the principles on which the award of the concurrent regulations is based. But no notice whatever has been taken of this just demand by our Government. It was stated in the case of the United States, but seems to have wilted in the formidable presence of the plea of estoppel as to the ownership and right of protection of the seals outside the 3-mile limit.

That estoppel, if the breadth of its sweep includes the seizure of ships and sanctifies the murder of the mother seals and the starvation of the pups, is quite as comprehensive as the bull's hide of Dido when it was cut into fine strings and was thus expanded to include the site of great Carthage in the location of the purchase of as much land as a bull's hide would cover.

Boscowitz, in whose name no demand is made, was found, by Judge Blodgett, upon the evidence, since then greatly strengthened, to be a citizen of the United States and the owner of the schooner W. P. Sayward, on which the sum demanded in the British claim is $90,902.12, besides $2,000 for sufferings, etc., to George P. Fery, the master of that vessel; and also of the steam schooner Thornton, for which $26,817.65 is claimed, besides $4,000 to Hans Guttornasen, her master, for "illegal arrest and imprisonment."

And also the steam schooner Anna Beck, for which $27,836.04 is claimed, besides $1,000 to Michael Keef, her master, for "sufferings," etc.

And also the steam schooner Grace, for which $38,142.57 is claimed, besides $2,000 to W. Petit, her master, for "sufferings," etc.

And also the steam schooner Dolphin, for which $40,201.50 is claimed, besides $2,635 to Warren, her master, and $1,000 to John Riley, her mate, for "sufferings," etc.

It is a curious feature found in these claims that the crews of these vessels get nothing for "sufferings," etc. If Boscowitz gets $236,534.88 out of the "lump sum," it will be a fearful price to pay the British Government for his benefit and to reward his criminal violation of our laws. I most respectfully insist that this, at least, is not res adjudicata.

His appearance in Paris, as we were informed, in furtherance of an effort made by the British agent to open the case and allow further proof of his citizenship and to show that he was a subject of Great Britain, which was refused by the Tribunal of Arbitration, is an important fact. This alone was sufficient to compel obedience to the demand of Article VIII of the treaty for further negotiation. But Great Britain preferred the lump-sum arrangement, doubtless because it was conscious that he was a citizen of the United States and had never been a subject of Great Britain. On page 755 of the case of the United States is this dispatch from Levi W. Myers, our consul at Victoria, British Columbia:

> Joseph Boscowitz, for many years last past a resident of Victoria, British Columbia, stated to me on October 24, 1892, that he has been all these years and is now a citizen of the United States of America.
> LEVI W. MYERS, Consul.

Theodore T. Williams gave his deposition on the 12th of December, 1892, and states as follows:

> Joseph Boscowitz became an American citizen by naturalization, coming to the United States from northern Europe. He was well known on the Pacific Coast as a citizen of the United States before he went to Vancouver to engage in business. He frequently spoke of his American citizenship as if he were proud of it, and spoke of himself as an American in Victoria when doing business there. He always passed as an American in Victoria.

Mr. Williams also proves that Boscowitz "owned the schooners that stood in the name of Captain Warren; but not only did he own an interest in these vessels, but furnished Warren money to obtain his share." Much other evidence is in easy reach to establish these facts and others as to Americans, citizens of the United States, for whom Great Britain is urging these claims. I will append the report of Mr. Foster to my remarks, from which it will be seen that the claims of Great Britain were greatly exaggerated, and that Boscowitz is the central figure in the case. (See Appendix 3.)

Sir Julian Pauncefote, in his letter to Earl Kimberley, in which he reviews my opinions, a much easier task than it is to meet the facts touching these claims, says: "Moreover, the principal transgressor referred to, whose name is Boscowitz, has denied that he is an American citizen." This mild and tentative answer to the finding of Judge Blodgett and the proof in the case would scarcely exonerate Mr. Boscowitz from the flagrant wrong he has done to the laws of his adopted country. But Sir Julian makes the following point, not of estoppel, but of the laws of nations, which, for ideal reasoning, is delightful. He says, "As regards the vessels themselves"—not the owners—"even if some of them, as contended by Senator MORGAN, were owned, or partly owned, by citizens of the United States (which I have shown could not be the case under our flag), such vessels became liable to be forfeited to the British Crown, and the United States Government, by whom they were wrongfully seized, would be bound to restore them, or their value, to Her Majesty's Government for the purposes of such forfeiture."

If Sir Julian had added this, "so that their value might be restored by Her Majesty's Government to the said violators of British law," he would have completed the circle of his reasoning. That is to say, if the United States seizes a vessel belonging to one of its citizens for the violation of its laws, and that vessel has also violated a law of Great Britain, the United States must surrender the vessel to Great Britain or its value, that it may be returned to the owner, who has violated the laws of both countries.

This interesting puzzle, however, has not been the subject of negotiation, and as it lays at the foundation of at least one-half of the "lump sum," I must insist on having the views of our Government upon this matter before I can support an appropriation for the benefit of Mr. Boscowitz, which hangs on this attenuated thread spun by the British ambassador. But I am not attempting to fully demonstrate the want of legal and moral soundness in the claims urged by Great Britain. I am only supporting my resolution for an investigation into these claims by the Senate, because we are not informed of their merits by any investigation or negotiation, conducted by the constitutional authorities of the United States. Other good reasons and much proof exist in support of this duty of the Senate to which I have not even alluded.

I have characterized the paper I hold in my hand and will print, by leave of the Senate, along with my remarks, as a circular, a political flyer, sent out as an appeal to the people against the vote of Congress at its last session.

Since that vote we are not informed that any negotiation has taken place. Indeed, it has been prevented by the demand of Great Britain, made on the 1st of March, 1895, the day before I was so unfortunate as to comment on a British claim in the Senate.

Earl Kimberley said to the British ambassador, "You should strongly urge the necessity of settling the question at once, either by the payment of a lump sum or by a convention for a claims commission."

That meant, as it did on June 7, 1894, that "it only now remains to assess the damages," and that the "claims commission" should be appointed "for the purpose of such assessment." This ultimatum was not pressed; it may never be pressed. It seems to have been abandoned in favor of the milder method of appealing to the people, and through them to Congress with the aid of the Executive, in the still lingering hope that a "negotiation" can still be avoided by voting a lump sum to Boscowitz and Great Britain.

In furtherance of this campaign of education Lord Salisbury prepared a "memorandum" which, it seems, was handed to the British ambassador while he was in London, on the 31st August, 1895. Sir Julian Pauncefote having exhausted his powers of logic, his discoveries in the law, and his rough criticisms on me in his letters to his Government, Lord Salisbury took up the subject and proceeded to give Sir Julian a "memorandum," in which he suggested some other arguments and caustic criticisms upon me because I ventured to sustain the action of Congress in refusing to vote a lump sum and asked for an investigation of the facts by the Senate, so that we should know what was required of us by honor and duty.

They both give me far greater prominence in their writings than they give to the questions at issue between the two Governments. I do not complain of this. Perhaps I may be unbecomingly careless of their opinions, all things considered; but I have a feeling of resentment that I do not care to conceal, that these great representatives of Her Majesty's Government had not made their complaints of a Senator of the United States to his own Government, or to the Senate, through the President, instead of waiting until Congress was about to assemble and then handing out these papers, so diligently prepared, to the newspaper press in Washington.

On the occasion I have referred to, August 31, 1894, Lord Salisbury, in his letter to Sir Julian Pauncefote, commented on his dispatches "of the 28th of February last and of the 4th, 5th, 15th, and 19th of March, relative to the claims for compensation from the United States on account of the seizure of the British sealing vessels in Bering Sea, which were duly received and have been read with careful attention."

If these dispatches did not sooner require acknowledgment, it must have been for the reason that the demand for a commission "to assess damages" was no longer urgent, and a new appeal was to be made "before the public in the United States," "both in and outside of Congress," for his lordship, proceeding, says to Sir Julian:

> I need scarcely say that the arguments you bring forward in support of the validity of those claims have the entire approval and concurrence of Her Majesty's Government. The attempt made by Senator MORGAN to dispute them seems to be largely founded on misapprehension, and Her Majesty's Government can not doubt that when the full facts are before the public in the United States the liability of that country to make compensation, which has never been denied by the Government, will generally be recognized both in and outside of Congress.
> As your excellency will shortly be returning to your post, I transmit to you herewith, for such use as you may find convenient, a memorandum, setting out at somewhat greater length some of the points in support of the claims to which you have alluded in your dispatches referred to.
> I am, etc., SALISBURY.

It was reasonable to suppose that in the six months that had elapsed between March 4, when Sir Julian had buried me under his ponderous logic, and the 31st of August, when Lord Salisbury thought it best to exhume my remains for another airing, that Congress and Mr. HITT and the people would have come to their reason and might be ready to vote the "lump sum" without further inquiry. But Lord Salisbury evidently thought that we needed some further information as to law and precedents, but not as to the facts relating to the starvation of seal pups or Boscowitz, and that we needed the tonic of the British sense of honor to brace us up to our duty in swallowing the lump sum. So his lordship, with thoughtful regard for our national propriety, made his "memorandum" and handed it to Sir Julian "for such use as you may find most convenient."

It ignored but could not suppress some of Sir Julian's most striking assaults, but it was so smooth and gentle in its general approval and concurrence that no one can feel surprised that Sir Julian should hand out the whole correspondence with his Government to the American press, which he did. For the first time within my knowledge the British Government has taken the people of the United States into its sacred confidence and has displayed before them the want of wisdom and knowledge of law and facts that caused the "Republicans, Populists, and 48 Democrats" to vote down the President's recommendation of a "lump sum," and to insist on further negotiation and at least some proof of the justice of the British demand.

We have at least learned something from these great diplomatists about the merits of the British contention, and that it does not appeal to truth or justice for its support, but to the suppression of an inquiry into the facts by a technical estoppel, which cuts off the "further negotiation" as to the question of our liability, for which the treaty expressly provides. The world will never believe that "the assessment of damages" is even in the nature of a negotiation as to the question of liability for damages. It might as well be said that the ships that appeared at Corinto to collect a fine levied by Great Britain were there to negotiate as to the liability of Nicaragua to pay that exaction.

I have not thought it best, in discussing this resolution, to allude to the facts relating to the recent loss of seal life that the President refers to in his annual message to this Congress. When those facts are fully understood I believe it will be manifest that the recent decrease in the seal herd is due to the persistent and illegal violation of the award and the laws to enforce its observance by the pelagic hunters, and that inefficient regulations have contributed largely to their opportunities for doing their destructive work.

APPENDIX No. 1.

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION ON ACCOUNT OF BRITISH VESSELS SEIZED IN BERING SEA BY UNITED STATES CRUISERS.

No. 1.

Colonial office to foreign office.—(Received May 9.)

DOWNING STREET, May 8, 1895.

SIR: I am directed by the Marquis of Ripon to transmit to you, to be laid before the Earl of Kimberley, copy of a dispatch and inclosure from the Governor-General of Canada, respecting the claims of British subjects in respect of the illegal seizure of their sealing vessels in Bering Sea by the authorities of the United States.

Now that the legislation for the enforcement of the regulations prescribed by the arbitrators has been completed, Lord Ripon hopes that the arrangements for settling these long outstanding claims will be pressed forward as quickly as possible.

The question raised by the Dominion Government as to the proof which will be required is one which Lord Ripon is disposed to think must be settled by the commission which it is proposed shall adjudicate on the claims, and his lordship would suggest that in negotiating the convention for the appointment of such a commission the British ambassador should obtain a recognition of the principle that compensation when awarded should cover the expense of establishing the right to compensation, though it might be left to the commission to say whether, in any particular case, the claimant should be allowed the costs incurred in proving his claim.

In the meantime I am to suggest that Sir J. Pauncefote should be instructed by telegraph to press the United States Government to begin the negotiation of the convention for the appointment of a commission to adjudicate on the claims, and that he should be desired. as soon as a date has been fixed for commencing the discussion, to telegraph for a Canadian delegate to assist him in case Dr. Dawson is not empowered to discuss the question.

I am, etc.,

JOHN BRAMSTON.

The Earl of Aberdeen to the Marquis of Ripon.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Ottawa, March 15, 1894.

MY LORD: With reference to previous correspondence on the subject of the presentation to the United States Government of the claims for damages preferred by the owners of sealing vessels seized in Bering Sea, I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council, embodying a report by the minister of marine and fisheries, in which, referring to the action of the United States Government in disputing the ownership of these vessels before the Bering Sea Tribunal, he discusses the question of the measures to be taken to establish such ownership to the satisfaction of that Government.

Your lordship will observe that my ministers would be glad to learn the opinion of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the methods to be adopted with this end; and, further, to know whether they would insist on the submission of such evidence of ownership and national character as would be necessary to meet the requirements of the merchant shipping act and the mercantile law of Great Britain in these particulars.

I have, etc.,

ABERDEEN.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 1.]

Report of a committee of the honorable the privy council, approved by his excellency the Governor-General in council on the 9th of March, 1894.

On a report, dated the 6th of March, 1894, from the minister of marine and fisheries, stating with reference to the approved minute of council of the 20th of February, 1894, touching the ownership of some of the vessels which suffered losses by reason of seizures and other molestation by the United States Government in Bering Sea, that he has had under further consideration the position taken by the United States Government, as defined in the counter case of the United States before the Tribunal of Arbitration, in disputing the ownership of the vessels in question.

The minister submits that this question can not be satisfactorily dealt with at the present stage of these claims.

The papers relating to it which have come to the possession of your excellency's Government have been submitted for the information of Her Majesty's Government.

Respecting the method to establish the ownership, it appears that the authorities of the United States formerly refused to recognize the proof of ownership as furnished, but they have given no further intimation of what evidence is required. If, however, further proof is to be made a matter of negotiation between the two Governments, instead of considering what further proof can be adduced, it appears that it should be ascertained from the United States Government what further proof it desires.

The minister suggests that it should be ascertained whether the United States desires an oral examination of witnesses, or an inquiry into the state of liens on these vessels, or whether written depositions on these points would be satisfactory.

The minister also suggests that the views of Her Majesty's Government should be sought as to an inquiry of that kind being made. Also, whether it will be insisted by Her Majesty's Government that the ownership and national character of these vessels shall be decided according to the facts which give that character under the merchant shipping act and mercantile law of Great Britain, in so far as it bears on proof of ownership and national character.

These suggestions it is expected may lead to the ascertainment of the views of the United States Government on the further point whether some tribunal or commission is to be established for hearing these claims, and whether the procedure before the tribunal is to be regulated by the convention which is to establish it. If the tribunal is to be established by convention without any order of procedure being settled, it will doubtless be for the tribunal itself to define the nature of the evidence to be admitted and further proof required; also, as to whether such as has already been adduced is considered satisfactory evidence of nationality and ownership.

The committee, on the recommendation of the minister of marine and fisheries, advise that your excellency be moved to forward a certified copy of this minute, if approved, to the right honorable the principal secretary of state for the colonies, for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

All of which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. McGEE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

No. 2.

The Earl of Kimberley to Sir J. Pauncefote.

[Telegraphic.]

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 10, 1894.

You should urge the United States Government to commence negotiations on the subject of the claims of British sealers seized by the United States cruisers in Bering Sea as soon as you have carried out the instructions contained in my telegram of the 8th instant, authorizing you to exchange notes with Mr. Gresham respecting the sealing regulations.

When you are ready for a Canadian delegate, you can telegraph to the Canadian Government to send one.

No. 3.

Sir J. Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberley.—(Received May 10.)

[Telegraphic.]

WASHINGTON, May 10, 1894.

Bering Sea. With reference to your lordship's telegram of to-day, I arranged yesterday with Mr. Gresham for the exchange of notes, and discussed with him at the same time the question of the settlement of the British claims, which he is quite ready to take up.

I venture to suggest that the most inexpensive and expeditious process might be to appoint a commissioner on each side to verify the claims at Victoria, British Columbia, and make a joint report, so far as they could agree, assessing the damages on each claim, and, where they failed to agree, stating the grounds of their disagreement. The two Governments could then either refer the points in difference to an umpire, or determine them themselves.

If the above suggestion meets with your lordship's approval, would it not be well, before sending for the Canadian delegate, to consult the Canadian Government and settle the basis of the convention?

No. 4.

Foreign office to colonial office.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 10, 1894.

SIR: The Earl of Kimberley has had under his consideration your letter of the 8th instant, inclosing a dispatch from the Governor-General of Canada respecting the claims of British subjects in respect of the illegal seizure of their sealing vessels in Bering Sea by the authorities of the United States.

I am directed by his lordship to state, in reply, for the information of the Marquis of Ripon, that a telegram has this day been sent to Her Majesty's ambassador at Washington, instructing him to press the United States Government to begin negotiations respecting these claims as soon as the notes relating to the naval regulations and arrangements under articles 4 and 7 of the award shall have been exchanged.

His excellency has at the same time been authorized to telegraph to Canada for a delegate when his services are required.

Lord Kimberley would suggest that the Canadian Government should be asked to communicate to Sir J. Pauncefote the substance of the inclosures to your letter now under reply.

I am, etc.,

H. PERCY ANDERSON.

FOREIGN OFFICE, May 11, 1894.

SIR: With reference to my letter of yesterday's date relating to claims arising out of the seizures of British sealers in Bering Sea by the United States authorities, I am directed by the Earl of Kimberley to transmit to you, to be laid before the Marquis of Ripon, the accompanying telegram from Her Majesty's ambassador at Washington,[1] stating that he has arranged with the Secretary of State for the exchange of notes respecting the naval regulations and the articles 4 and 7 of the award, and that the United States Government is quite ready to take up the question of British claims.

Sir Julian Pauncefote suggests a mode of procedure with regard to these claims which he considers would be the most expeditious and inexpensive way of dealing with them, and I am to state that Lord Kimberley would be glad to learn Lord Ripon's views as to his excellency's proposition with as little delay as possible.

DOWNING STREET, May 16, 1894.

SIR: I am directed by the Marquis of Ripon to acknowledge the receipt of your letters of the 10th and 11th instant respecting the claims of British subjects in respect of the illegal seizure of their sealing vessels in Bering Sea by the authorities of the United States.

Lord Ripon desires me to inclose, for the information of the Earl of Kimberley, a copy of a telegram which he has addressed to the Governor-General of Canada on the subject of Sir Julian Pauncefote's telegram of the 10th instant;[1] and he desires me to say that he thinks it will be as well to have the views of the Government of Canada before settling the basis of the proposed convention, and that, as that may give rise to discussion, he thinks it might expedite matters if a Canadian delegate, fully instructed as to the views of the Dominion Government, were to proceed to Washington at once, but before expressing a final opinion Lord Ripon proposes to await the reply from the Governor-General to the telegram inclosed.

FOREIGN OFFICE, June 1, 1894.

SIR: With reference to my letter of the 11th ultimo relative to the British Bering Sea claims, I am directed by the Earl of Kimberley to transmit to you, to be laid before the Marquis of Ripon, the accompanying telegram from Her Majesty's ambassador at Washington,[2] stating that the arrangement proposed in his excellency's telegram of the 10th ultimo is approved by the Canadian Government and favorably entertained by that of the United States.

Under these circumstances, Sir Julian Pauncefote inquires whether we may officially present the whole of these claims to the United States Government, and propose a convention for their verification and settlement on the basis of the arrangement already proposed by his excellency.

Lord Kimberley proposes to authorize Sir J. Pauncefote to adopt this course should Lord Ripon concur therein.

WASHINGTON, June 12, 1894.

With reference to your lordship's telegram of the 5th instant respecting Bering Sea, I have the honor to report that I have forwarded to your lordship, in my dispatch of the 8th instant, a copy of my note to Mr. Gresham transmitting the Bering Sea claims, and proposing a mode of settlement.

I have also sent a copy of this note to Lord Aberdeen.

As the President is indisposed, and Mr. Gresham is about to leave Washington for a short period, I do not expect to receive on official reply for ten days or more.

But the Secretary of State tells me that the President approves the proposal, and, in accordance with his request, I am preparing a scheme of convention for consideration before requesting the assistance of a Canadian delegate.

Sir J. Pauncefote to Mr. Gresham.

WASHINGTON, June 7, 1894.

SIR: Adverting to the verbal communications which have passed between us respecting the best mode of verifying and adjusting the British claims for compensation for the seizure of British sealing vessels in Bering Sea, I have now the honor to transmit herewith, by direction of Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, a complete list and summary of those claims, together with memoranda of the additions and amendments made since their original presentation. I am, at the same time, to make the following suggestion, with a view to adjustment of those claims with the least possible expense and delay.

The whole of the claims, excepting that of the Henrietta and that of the Black Diamond (1886), were laid before the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, together with the evidence in support of them. The facts on which they rest were found by the arbitrators as provided by Article VIII of the treaty of arbitration, and formed part of the award. In view of the decision of the tribunal on the questions of law submitted to them, it only now remains to assess the damages. I am, accordingly, authorized by the Earl of Kimberley to propose that for the purpose of such assessment each Government should appoint a duly qualified commissioner, who should be a lawyer and if possible, possess some knowledge of the conditions of the seal industry.

That the two commissioners should sit together at Victoria, British Columbia, where all the evidence in verification of the claims can be obtained on the spot.

That they should make a joint report on all the claims in which they have agreed as to the amount of damages, and separate reports of the cases in which they have failed to agree, fully stating the grounds of such disagreement.

That the assessment of damages by the two commissioners, where they have been able to agree, shall be final.

That in cases where they have been unable to agree, the differences shall be settled by the two Governments within a fixed period, failing which, such differences shall be referred for final adjustment to an umpire to be appointed by the two Governments jointly, or, in case of disagreement, to be nominated by a foreign government.

You informed me some time ago that, in the view of your Government, a convention would be necessary for the adjustment of the claims, and the Earl of Kimberley, to whom I did not fail to communicate that opinion, has instructed me to proceed at once with the negotiation of such a convention, on the basis of the arrangement above proposed, should it be favorably entertained by your Government.

I have, etc., JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

[Inclosure 3 in No. 12.]

Memoranda of additions and amendments made since the original presentation of Bering Sea claims.[1]

ADA.

Claim of the master, Captain Gaudin, for personal loss and damage, $3,000.

This claim was, by a mistake on the part of the agent of the owner of the Ada, not included when the other claims in connection with this vessel were entered. Captain Gaudin thought that it had been so included, and it was only on seeing the printed list of the British claims that he discovered that such was not the case. He at once requested that the omission might be rectified, and his claim added to the list, and Her Majesty's Government, after causing an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the case, decided that his application should be granted.

Captain Gaudin's claim has accordingly been added to the schedule of the claims entered with respect to the schooner Ada.

HENRIETTA.

Seized by the U. S. S. Yorktown on September 4, 1892.

Value of vessel	$4,000
Value of outfit and equipment	3,000
Value of 420 seal skins, at $18	7,560
Value of balance of estimated full catch for season in Bering Sea for 3 boats and 3 canoes, viz, 561 skins, at $18	10,098
Legal and personal expenses in defending action against vessel and cargo at Sitka and in preparing and forwarding this claim	2,000
Claim of owner, with interest at 7 per cent to date of payment	26,658

In his note, dated the 13th of March last, Mr. Gresham stated that from the date on which the Henrietta was handed over to her captain the United States Government ceased to bear any responsibility or to exercise any control with regard to that vessel, and that therefore they were unable to comply with the request of Her Majesty's Government that she should be sent to a British port for trial; but he added that the claim of her owner for compensation would receive due consideration when presented.

The claim in question has therefore been added to the general list of British claims.

BLACK DIAMOND.

Additional claim submitted by the master, Mr. Henry Paxton, for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the above schooner having been ordered out of Bering Sea in 1886 by the United States authorities:

Estimated catch for August, 1886, 1,000 skins, at $7.50 each (the price of skins at Victoria during the fall of 1886) $7,500.

This claim was sent in too late for insertion in the general list of British claims. In view of the length of time that had elapsed since the occurrence of the action complained of, Her Majesty's Government deemed it advisable to cause an inquiry to be made as to the reason for the delay in presenting the claim. The reason given was that at the time of the seizure of the vessel the coowners, who were three in number, were doubtful as to how far an appeal to the United States Government for redress would be entertained. In the following year one of the owners was lost at sea and another left the country, and it was only after the publication of the award that the surviving owner consulted his solicitor, and was informed that he had a good and equitable claim for compensation. The claim was then drawn up and presented at once.

Her Majesty's Government also ascertained from the solicitors in question that the fact of the Black Diamond being boarded by the revenue officers of the United States and ordered out of Bering Sea in 1886 is entered in the records of the custom-house of Unalaska, and that due protest was made by the master of the vessel on the arrival of the schooner at Victoria.

Under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government considered that the reasons alleged for the delay were reasonable, and gave instructions that the claim should be presented to the United States Government, together with the other similar claims.

JUANITA.

It will be noticed that the original claim of the owner of the Juanita, which was stated at $14,695, has been amended so as to amount to $17,697.66.

The ground upon which this claim was amended was that the owner made his original statement on the basis of $8 per skin, whereas it was ascertained afterwards that the skins had been sold at San Francisco at an average of $9.67 per skin.

Sir Julian Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberley.—(Received July 14.)

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1894.

With reference to my telegram to your lordship of the 12th instant respecting the Bering Sea claims, I have the honor to report that, while discussing with the Secretary of State the terms of the proposed convention, I was requested by him to ascertain whether Her Majesty's Government would be disposed to settle those claims for a lump sum. If so, he was of opinion that there would be no difficulty in obtaining from Congress an appropriation for whatever amount should be agreed upon. Should no agreement be arrived at, the convention would proceed.

If the above course be acceptable, an expert should be sent at once to Washington by the Canadian Government to discuss the amount.

[Extract.]

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1894.

I have the honor to report that Sir C. Tupper, the Canadian minister of marine, arrived on Saturday last to discuss with me the position of the pending negotiations respecting the Bering Sea claims.
We called the same day on the Secretary of State, and yesterday morning Sir Charles Tupper, at my request, accompanied me to the State Department, where we had an interview with Mr. Gresham.
We then discussed the question of the lump sum, and Mr. Gresham stated that a week ago the appropriation of the money by Congress could easily have been obtained, but it was too late now owing to the departure of the members and of the impracticability of obtaining a voting quorum.
He added, however, that there would be no difficulty in getting the appropriation voted on the meeting of Congress in December next.
He therefore suggested that the lump sum might be accepted subject to the right of Her Majesty's Government to resume the negotiations for the convention at any time before the appropriation should be actually made.
This proposal, appearing satisfactory to Sir Charles Tupper, was accepted by me, and I have now the honor to inclose copies of the notes exchanged between Mr. Gresham and myself recording the arrangement.
Sir Charles Tupper left for Ottawa this morning.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 21, 1894.

EXCELLENCY: Referring to our verbal communications of a recent date, I have now the honor formally to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 7th of June last, in which you propose, in behalf of Her Majesty's Government, the establishment of a mixed commission for the purpose of verifying and adjusting the British claims for compensation for the seizure of British sealing vessels in Bering Sea.
While no serious difficulty is anticipated in settling and determining the claims by means of a mixed commission, it is a matter of interest to both Governments that they should, if possible, be disposed of in a simpler and less expensive way. Proceedings by a mixed commission, while always more or less formal and cumbersome, are, like all other processes of litigation, necessarily attended with expense, not infrequently considerable in amount, as well as with delay.
In the present case, the award and findings of the Tribunal of Arbitration in Paris have to a great extent determined the facts and the principles on which the claims should be adjusted; and in the course of the negotiations for a mixed commission, they have been subjected by both Governments to a thorough examination both upon the principles and facts which they involve.
Under these circumstances the President, after full consideration of the whole subject, has reached the conclusion that it may be practicable, as well as advantageous, to effect a direct settlement of the claims by the payment of a lump sum in full satisfaction of all demands for damages against the United States growing out of the controversy between the two Governments as to the fur seals in Bering Sea, and to this end I am instructed by the President to propose the sum of $425,000.
This proposition, if it should prove to be acceptable to Her Majesty's Government, is to be understood as having been made subject to the action of Congress on the question of appropriating the money. The President can only undertake to submit the matter to Congress at the beginning of its session in December next, with a recommendation that the money be appropriated and made immediately available for the purpose above expressed; and if at any time before the appropriation is made your Government shall desire, it is understood that the negotiations on which we have for some time been engaged for the establishment of a mixed commission will be renewed.

I have, etc.,

W. Q. GRESHAM.

[Inclosure 2 in No. 26.]

Sir J. Pauncefote to Mr. Gresham.

WASHINGTON, August 21, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of this date on the subject of our recent negotiations for the adjustment, by means of a mixed commission, of the claims of Great Britain against the United States in respect of the seizure of British sealing vessels by United States cruisers in Bering Sea. You state that the President, after full consideration, is of opinion that it would be in the interest of both Governments to effect the direct settlement of claims by the payment of a lump sum, in order to avoid the delay and expense of a mixed commission, and that you have been instructed to propose the sum of $425,000.
You also state that the proposal is made subject to the necessary appropriation by Congress, to which it would be submitted at the beginning of its session in December next, with a recommendation that the money be immediately available for the purpose above mentioned.
You add that if at any time before the appropriation is made Her Majesty's Government shall desire it, the negotiations for the establishment of a mixed commission shall be resumed.
I have the honor to state, in reply, that Her Majesty's Government concur in the views of the President as to the expediency of effecting a settlement by the method proposed, and that they are, indeed, so fully sensible of the great advantages presented to both Governments by that course that they are willing to accept the sum offered, coupled with the assurance of prompt payment, although the amount is much below their estimate of the compensation which might fairly be awarded by a mixed commission.
It should be understood, therefore, that if the negotiations for a mixed commission should be resumed, the acceptance of your proposal shall in no way prejudice the claimants in the further prosecution of their demands.
It only remains for me to express my gratification at this amicable solution of the last subject of discussion in the long Bering Sea controversy.

I have, etc.,

MY LORD: I have the honor to forward herewith an extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 15th instant, containing a resolution brought forward in the House of Representatives by the Hon. Mr. HITT, requesting the publication of all documents touching the payment by the United States of $425,000 to Great Britain for damages growing out of the controversy as to fur seals in Bering Sea.
This resolution, together with a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, was laid on the table.
I understand from Mr. Gresham that full particulars concerning the arrangements arrived at have been given to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that there is no reason to doubt that the money will be appropriated, notwithstanding the attempt made to obstruct the settlement.

I have, etc.,

THE BERING SEA CONTROVERSY.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged resolution reported to-day from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the interests of the public service, all correspondence, reports, and other documents not heretofore made public, touching the payment by the United States of $425,000 to Great Britain for damages growing out of the controversy as to fur seals in Bering Sea, or the seizure of British vessels engaged in taking seals in those waters."

Mr. HITT. That is a unanimous report, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. It is all right.

The resolution was adopted.

On the motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

BERING SEA DAMAGES.

WASHINGTON, December 20, 1894.

Secretary Gresham sent to the House the correspondence which resulted in the offer of the United States to pay $425,000 as damages for seizures or warnings of British sealers declared by the Paris Tribunal to have been illegal. With it was a statement of the British claims. In his report the Secretary says:

"If the plan of settlement recited by the President in his annual message is not acceptable to Congress, the controverted questions must be determined either by the organization of a joint commission or by negotiations between the two Governments. Experience has shown that international commissions are slow and expensive. Should such a course be resorted to, the evidence would be found mostly on the Pacific Coast, widely scattered, and counsel would be needed to examine and cross-examine witnesses.

"The question of indirect or consequential damages having been withdrawn from the Tribunal of Arbitration, the pending claims are for British vessels actually seized in Bering Sea or warned out of it by cruisers of the United States. It will appear from the submitted correspondence that the agreement to pay a lump sum of $425,000 in full settlement of all demands, authorized to be made under the treaty and award, was proposed by this Government. The amount is considerably below the damages claimed by Great Britain, exclusive of interest for a number of years.

"If this arrangement does not receive the approval of Congress, and the disputed questions are submitted to an international commission, it is believed that the amounts allowed and the expense of the tribunal, including witnesses and the taking of their testimony, will largely exceed $425,000. In view of the facts and what may be reasonably expected as the result of a commission, the undersigned submits that a prompt and final settlement of the vexatious controversy by an appropriation of the lump sum agreed upon is advisable."

WASHINGTON, January 21, 1895.

MY LORD: With reference to my dispatch of the 21st December, I now have the honor to forward herewith to your lordship printed correspondence touching the Bering Sea controversy, which has been laid before the House of Representatives pursuant to the House resolution, dated the 15th December, 1894.

[Inclosure in No. 29.]

Fifty-third Congress, third session. Executive Document No. 132. House of Representatives.

BERING SEA CONTROVERSY.

Letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution dated December 15, the correspondence touching the Bering Sea controversy.

December 21, 1894.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives:

The undersigned is directed by the President to respond to the resolution adopted by your honorable body on the 15th instant, requesting the Secretary of State "to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not inconsistent with the interests of the public service, all correspondence, reports, and other documents not heretofore made public touching the payment by the United States of $425,000 to Great Britain for damages growing out of the controversy as to fur seals in Bering Sea, or the seizure of British vessels engaged in taking seals in those waters."

The undersigned accordingly has the honor to communicate to the House of Representatives copies of the correspondence exchanged on the subject covered by the resolution, in which will be found a statement of the claims filed by Great Britain for damages sustained by British subjects by reason of seizure of their sealing vessels in Bering Sea, or of being warned to cease operations therein.

The Paris Tribunal of Arbitration held that the United States had no right of protection or property in the fur seals in Bering Sea outside the ordinary 3-mile limit.

Article VIII of the convention of the 29th February, 1892, whereby the questions which had arisen between the two Governments concerning the jurisdictional rights of the United States in the waters of Bering Sea were submitted to arbitration, recited that the high contracting parties had been unable to agree upon a reference which would include the question of the liability of each for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the other, or by its citizens, in connection with the claims presented and urged by it, and that, being solicitous that this subordinate question should not interrupt or longer delay the submission and determination of the main questions, they had agreed "that either may submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in said claims and ask for a finding thereon, the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiation."

Under this article the arbitrators unanimously found that a number of British sealing vessels were seized in Bering Sea, or warned therefrom by cruisers of the United States on the days and at the places in the special finding mentioned, leaving for future determination the questions as to the value "of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States."

If the plan of settlement recommended by the President in his last annual message is not acceptable to Congress, the remaining controverted questions must be determined either by the organization of a joint commission, or by negotiations between the two Governments.

Experience has shown that international commissions are slow and expensive. Should such a course be resorted to, the evidence would be found mostly on the Pacific Coast, widely scattered, and counsel would be needed to examine and cross-examine witnesses.

The question of indirect or consequential damages having been withdrawn from the Tribunal of Arbitration, the pending claims are for British vessels actually seized in Bering Sea, or warned out of it by cruisers of the United States.

It will appear from the submitted correspondence that the agreement to pay a lump sum of $425,000 in full settlement of all demands authorized to be made under the treaty and award was proposed by this Government. The amount is considerably below the damages claimed by Great Britain, exclusive of interest for a number of years.

If this arrangement does not receive the approval of Congress and the disputed questions are submitted to an international commission, it is believed that the amounts allowed and the expense of the tribunal, including witnesses and the taking of their testimony, will largely exceed $425,000.

In view of all the facts and what may be reasonably expected as the result of a commission, the undersigned submits that a prompt and final settlement of the vexatious controversy by an appropriation of the lump sum agreed upon is advisable.

Respectfully submitted.

W. Q. GRESHAM.

Bering Sea: Lump sum.

The House of Representatives, by an adverse vote of 143 against 112, rejected the proposed appropriation for the payment of the lump sum agreed on. In Committee of the Whole House it had previously been adopted by a vote of 94 to 86.

In your telegram of yesterday's date you reported the rejection by the House of Representatives of the appropriation of a lump sum of $425,000 in settlement of the Bering Sea claims.

Has this settlement been definitively rejected, or will it be revived in some other form?

DOWNING STREET, February 28, 1895.

SIR: I am directed by the Marquis of Ripon to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th instant,[1] reporting that the House of Representatives in the United States had rejected the vote for $425,000 in settlement of the Bering Sea claims.

I am to request that you will inform the Earl of Kimberley that Lord Ripon has received this intelligence with much regret, as he had hoped that an end of this controversy had been reached.

It will now be necessary to resume at once the negotiation of the convention, and as Congress will rise at an early date, and the ratification of the convention, if not concluded at once, will be postponed for another year, he would suggest that Her Majesty's ambassador at Washington should be instructed to resume without delay the discussion of that instrument; and Lord Ripon proposes, if Lord Kimberley concurs, to telegraph to the Dominion Government to send someone at once to Washington to assist in the negotiation.

I am, etc.,

EDWARD FAIRFIELD.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 1, 1895.

I have received your excellency's telegram of the 28th ultimo on the subject of the Bering Sea claims.

You should ask Mr. Gresham whether he will at once resume negotiations for a convention.

Lord Ripon suggests that the Government of Canada should send a delegate to assist at Washington.

You should strongly urge the necessity of settling the question at once, either by the payment of the lump sum or by a convention for a claims commission.

WASHINGTON, March 2, 1895.

Bering Sea claims: Your lordship's telegram of the 1st.

The Secretary of State informed me that he is quite prepared immediately to resume negotiations for a convention. Present session of Congress, however, closes on the 4th instant, and the convention, when signed, must be submitted for confirmation by a two-thirds majority in the Senate. It can not, therefore be submitted to the Senate unless a special session be called before next December.

I have urged in the strongest language the necessity of a prompt settlement of the claims one way or another, and every effort to effect it has been vainly exhausted by the President and Mr. Gresham. They have even failed in an attempt to obtain from Congress an appropriation for the payment of the claims subject to their examination by a commission to be appointed for that purpose, or for the simple expenses of such a commission.

I received from Mr. Gresham to-day an expression of the deep regret felt by the President and himself at the unexpected situation in which they found themselves placed, and at their inability to prevent the delay which now, most unfortunately, must occur in adjusting these claims and discharging the national obligations of the United States.

FOREIGN OFFICE, March 6, 1895.

SIR: At an interview to-day with Mr. Bayard I expressed to his excellency the great regret with which Her Majesty's Government had learned that Congress had separated without voting the sum for the Bering Sea claims or making any provision for a commission to examine them.

I feared that not only would this failure to execute the award cause much dissatisfaction here and in Canada, but that it would tend to diminish confidence in the principle of arbitration.

It was the more unfortunate, because it was coincident with the proposal made by the United States Government to reopen the whole matter which had so recently been settled by the arbitration.

Mr. Bayard said he shared my regret at the failure of Congress to provide for the payment of the British claims, but that he was certain that the President and Mr. Gresham had done their utmost to induce Congress to vote the money.

I assured his excellency that Her Majesty's Government had no complaint to make of the action of the President or Mr. Gresham, and I informed him of the purport of your excellency's telegram of the 3d instant on this subject.

I am, etc.,

KIMBERLEY.

MY LORD: With reference to my telegram of to-day's date, I have the honor to inclose herewith extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing an account of the rejection of the proposed appropriation of $425,000 to pay damages arising out of seizures in Bering Sea.

The proposal, after a two hours' debate, was approved in Committee of the Whole House by a vote of 98 to 86, but on a subsequent vote, when the amendment was reported, the House rejected it by a majority of 142 to 113.

I have the honor to append a précis of the debate prepared in this embassy.

Précis of debate in House of Representatives February 25, 1895.

The House being in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the general deficiency bill—

Mr. Breckinridge moved an amendment, providing for the payment of $425,000 to Great Britain in full satisfaction of all demands for damages growing out of the controversy between the two Governments as to the fur seals in Bering Sea.

There was no question, he said, that under the decision of the arbitrators the United States should pay something. It was objected that the amount agreed on was excessive, in view of the fact that the claims were in part based on consequential damages, which, in the case of the Alabama, were not admitted. But there was a clear difference between the cases. In the case of the Alabama the wrong was the indirect act of the Government, and in the present case it was the direct act. And, further, in the present case, a rule was agreed on which allowed consequential damages. Judgment had been given against the United States, and the only question left was the assessment of damages. Leaving out the consequential damages, there would remain a claim, practically undisputed, for $227,000, on which interest would have to be paid for seven years, if the matter was referred to a commission, and in addition there would be the expense of having arbitrators. The bargain was not a bad one, and on broader grounds it did not become the United States to go down to the tavern and denounce the judge, as litigants sometimes do who have lost their case. The right course was to settle the matter at once and remove it as a cause of disagreement between the two peoples.

Mr. CANNON (Republican) was not opposed to the payment unless it reversed a principle already settled. The arbitrators only decided the question of fact as to seizure and warning out; the question of the amount of damage and the ownership of the vessels was left open for future negotiation. As to prospective damages, it had been decided in the case of the Alabama that they could not properly be made subject of compensation. As to the question of ownership, it was clear from the evidence (Mr. Foster's statement published in the last Senate document, page 164) that the great majority of the vessels seized were owned by Americans. The most that could fairly be conceded was $103,000.

Mr. HOOKER (Democrat) denied that the analogy with the Alabama case held good. The vessels were equipped in Canadian waters for the purpose of prosecuting what was now conceded by both parties to have been a lawful act, and the United States was responsible for whatever damages ensued from their seizure. It was not improbable that if the matter were referred to a commission the United States would have to pay $1,000,000 instead of less than half that sum.

Mr. HENDERSON (Republican) quoted from Mr. Foster's statement, and asked how in the face of it the Secretary of State could have made such an agreement. This large sum should not be paid when there was high authority for the statement that most of the claims were unwarranted and unjust. He advocated the commission provided for in the treaty, in order that if there were any Americans masquerading under British auspices they might be smoked out.

Mr. MCCREARY (Democrat) said that of the two alternatives he thought the payment of a lump sum would be the most economical, and that promptness in paying the claims was in the line of economy, justice, and honor.

Mr. HITT (Republican) said that in the case of ten out of the twenty ships seized the real owners were Americans. These men were not engaged in a "lawful occupation," but one forbidden by the laws of their own country. They were entitled to fine and imprisonment, not to compensation. He quoted the case of Boscowitz, an American, who lent money to a Canadian named Warren on the security of certain ships, foreclosed, and then sold the ships, which thus passed into his hands, to a Canadian named Cooper, for the sum of $1. This man Cooper now appeared among the claimants for the sum of $225,000 for the seizure of ships which really belonged to Boscowitz. Cooper had testified that he did not even know the number or names of the ships, and that he had nothing to do with them. Of the total amount of $542,000 claimed, $360,000 represented the interests of Americans. As to the character of the claims, the great mass was for an estimated catch—$377,000 out of $542,000. It had been decided at Geneva that compensation was not to be paid for prospective earnings. As to the argument that the two Governments had agreed to pay compensation for such losses, it referred only to the claim for damages under the modus vivendi. That portion of the claim had been formerly abandoned by the two Governments. As to the fear expressed that more claims would be presented in case of the appointment of a commission, it was clear from the words of the British ambassador that the claims presented in June, 1894, included all the claims. A commission, as proposed by Sir Julian Pauncefote, would probably cost about $15,000, and would result, perhaps, in the payment by the United States of $50,000, which is about what was due.

Mr. DINGLEY (Republican) would not say with certainty that the claim for prospective damages would be disallowed by the commission. He quoted the case of the Halifax award. It was a case of a choice of two evils, and it was impossible to foresee what would be the decision of a foreign umpire.

Mr. Breckinridge, in reply, said that he agreed with the last speaker. The claims would grow enormously if the payment was put off, and an immediate settlement was preferable.

Mr. LIVINGSTON asked if Congress would not have the supervision of the payments made under the decision of the commission.

Mr. Breckinridge said that if Congress refused to make the payment prescribed by a legally constituted tribunal, it would be a delinquent at the international bar of public honesty and universal integrity. It was not true that Sir Julian Pauncefote had debarred himself from presenting additional claims. Take the case of a man who had died from the effects of imprisonment.

Mr. HITT denied that that claim could go before the commission.

Mr. Breckinridge maintained that it could. He pointed out that these ships had sailed from a British port under the British flag, and the burden was on the United States to overthrow the presumption arising from that fact. He predicted that this could never be accomplished. The United States had gone into the arbitration on the ground that the Bering Sea was United States property, and had lost. They ought now to take the consequences like men. As to the damages claimed, he thought that the prospective catch ought to be paid for. The real capital of these men was their sweat, their risk, their danger, their time. When they were seized and put in Alaskan prisons, without right and without justice, what better criterion of damage was there than what they might have caught, and what everyone but themselves did catch during that year? These were not remote damages. There was a vast difference between remote damages and consequential damages. There are innumerable cases where consequential damages are given where they are the immediate and not the remote consequences of the act. He quoted the statement of Sir E. Grey in Parliament as to the probable payment of the damages, and hoped that the United States would not be posted before the world like a delinquent at a club. He did not advocate this measure because it had been proposed by a Democratic President, but because on the floor of the House of Representatives he represented the entire Imperial Republic of America, and he did not wish the United States to stand before the nations as a nation which did not keep faith.

He appended to his speech, as printed, a calculation showing under several hypotheses the saving to the United States effected by the payment of a lump sum.

On a division there were—for the amendment 94, against 86.

The committee rose, and the House then voted on the appropriation bill as passed by the committee.

A separate vote was taken on the Bering Sea clause, when it appeared that there were—yeas 113, nays 142.

The majority comprised Republicans, Populists, and 48 Democrats.

Sir J. Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberly.—(Received March 11.)

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1895.

MY LORD: In my dispatch of the 26th instant I had the honor to report the adverse vote of the House of Representatives on the proposal to appropriate the sum of $425,000 to the payment of the Bering Sea claims, in accordance with the agreement concluded between the two Governments in August last.

The Committee of the Whole House had voted for the appropriation by a small majority, and the adverse majority subsequently obtained on what is termed a "yea-and-nay" vote was a surprise, as well as a grave disappointment.

Strong party feeling would seem alone to account for the rejection of so just and desirable an arrangement, and, as your lordship will have noticed from the inclosures in my dispatch, statements have been made in Congress which are entirely misleading, both as to the law and the facts of the case.

It is urged that the present claims are principally made out of "indirect" damages, because they include, in some cases, the loss of profits of the fishery season by sealing vessels warned out of Bering Sea.

Such damages were allowed when claimed by the United States in the Fortune Bay case on behalf of United States fishermen, whose rights of fishery had been forcibly interfered with by a mob on the coast of Newfoundland in 1878.

Again, it is pretended that a great majority of the sealing vessels on behalf of which the claims are made were the property of United States citizens, whereas there is no evidence whatever of any change of ownership in those vessels, which all carried the British flag and a British register.

One speaker represented the total amount of the claims to be only $542,000, whereas it was over $700,000. Another concluded from the fact that the offer of the lump sum and its acceptance appeared in notes of the same date that the offer was made without previous investigation, and was instantly snapped at by Her Majesty's Government, whereas the compromise recorded in those notes was the result of laborious negotiations, which were carried on during the whole summer.

There can be no doubt that the above inaccuracies were calculated to prejudice the minds of many members of Congress, and also to turn public opinion against a settlement of the question which was both equitable and advantageous to both parties.

The action of Congress is in strange contrast with the assurance given me by Mr. Blaine at the commencement of the negotiations which led to the Bering Sea arbitration, and is recorded in my dispatch of the 1st of November, 1889, "that his Government would not wish that private individuals who had acted bona fide in the belief that they were exercising their lawful rights should be the victims of a grave dispute between two great countries, which had happily been adjusted."

MY LORD: I have the honor to transmit to your lordship herewith extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing a report of a resolution introduced by Senator MORGAN for the appointment of a committee to examine into the question of the liability of the United States to pay claims arising out of the Bering Sea controversy, and also of the liability of Great Britain and Canada.

Your lordship will observe that Senator MORGAN alludes to a recent proposal made in the House of Commons to pay the claims in advance, as being made with a view to having "a moral claim on the United States for this $425,000, not one shilling of which is due."

Objection was interposed to the immediate consideration of the resolution, and it accordingly went over.

I have, etc., JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

[Inclosure in No. 40.]

Extract from the Congressional Record of March 1, 1895.

BRITISH BERING SEA CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

Ths Secretary read as follows:

"Resolved, That the message of the President received by the Senate on the 13th of February, 1895, relating to the payment by the United States of the claims of Great Britain arising out of the Bering Sea controversy, is referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instruction that such committee examine into the question of such liability to Great Britain and the amount thereof, if any, and of any liability on the part of Great Britain or Canada arising out of said controversy, and that said committee shall have authority to report by bill or otherwise; and, in making such examination, may sit in the vacation of the Senate."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama whether it would be wise to pass this resolution pending the controversy between the two Houses with respect to an appropriation of four hundred and some odd thousand dollars?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no such controversy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that matter is now in conference between the two Houses.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I beg pardon. There is no report in either House in favor of any money to go to Great Britain, as the case now stands.

Mr. HALE. Such an appropriation was stricken out in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; that was stricken out.

Mr. HALE. And the Senate committee has not put it in; so it is not in conference.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no controversy. I wish to make this statement: The British Parliament seems to be acting upon this subject now by anticipation. I see by the morning papers that Sir George Baden-Powell says that he wants to pay to the Canadians and to the recalcitrant and rascally Americans who hired themselves out to the British flag to rob the Government of the United States and to violate its laws and dishonor the country, and to pay them in advance, so as to have a moral claim on the United States for this $425,000, not one shilling of which is due.

I propose that the Committee on Foreign Relations shall investigate that matter. There has been enough of falsehood and misrepresentation about that in official documents and in newspapers to require, for the vindication of the honor of this country, that that investigation should be made; it makes no difference what any committee of this body may do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. TURPIE. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether the text of this resolution does not propose a revision of the Bering Sea arbitration.

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means. It is merely to ascertain what are the obligations of the respective Governments under it.

Mr. TURPIE. It seems to me that the text of the resolution, as I heard it read, proposes to review the proceedings of the international arbitration.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. It is merely to ascertain what are the liabilities of the respective Governments under it.

Mr. TURPIE. The liabilities spoken of are certainly res adjudicata.

Mr. MORGAN. I quoted from the language of the President of the United States in sending his message to the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask that the resolution be printed and go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the resolution will go over and be printed.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1895.

MY LORD: With reference to my dispatch of the 4th instant, I have the honor to inclose extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, containing a report of a debate in the Senate relative to the resolution introduced by Mr. MORGAN for the appointment of a commission to examine the question of the liability of the United States and Great Britain to pay claims arising out of the Bering Sea controversy.

Mr. MORGAN supported the resolution in a speech in which he severely criticised the policy pursued by Great Britain. Objection, however, being interposed, the resolution failed to pass. An abstract of the debate is inclosed herewith.

I have, etc., JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

[Inclosure 1 in No. 41.]

Extract from the Congressional Record of March 2, 1895.

[Not printed.]

[Inclosure 2 in No. 41.]

Report of debate in Senate, March 2, 1895.

Mr. MORGAN, in introducing his resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate the liability of the United States and Great Britain to pay claims arising out of the Bering Sea dispute, said that the question of the liability of the United States to pay damages was withdrawn from the consideration of the arbitrators and reserved for negotiation. The Secretary of State had made an arrangement to pay a lump sum in order to avoid negotiation. If the matter had come before the tribunal, Great Britain could not have recovered one cent. On the strongest point of the claim there could not be due to her more than $96,000; $173,000 had been claimed for three ships which were valued by appraisers at $12,000. He wished the whole question to be investigated by a set of commissioners "who may not perhaps have an embarrassment in a negotiation." It was not the fault of the award regulations that the seal herds were being depleted. The supplementary regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury were to blame, which allowed the sealers to pass through forbidden waters during the close season. Where were the records of the time and place of the catch made by the sealers which were prescribed by the award?

Great Britain had pledged herself to do her best to save the seals. But she had only sent one ship, which had passed the entire summer outside of Bering Sea in port. The United States had sent ten. The administration of the law on the part of the United States had been slack, and on the part of Great Britain absurdly inefficient. No evidence was presented upon which Great Britain could be held responsible for the conduct of her sealers. The Secretary of the Treasury had stated that he had papers in his possession which he had not communicated to the Senate. The whole matter was under a cloud of uncertainty, and therefore he proposed that there should be a fair and impartial but thorough investigation.

Mr. GRAY objected to the consideration of the motion. Mr. MORGAN had himself objected to the consideration of a bill providing for an international commission of inquiry, because he thought that it implied a reflection on the award regulations. No such reflection was implied. The Senator himself, as an arbitrator, had signed a recommendation that the herd should be allowed a rest of three years. There was not a particle of evidence to show lax administration of the law. The slaughter had taken place in the open season. Only one seizure had been made, and that ship was released. As to the lump sum, the settlement had been received with almost universal favor by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. It was far within the estimates made by the British claimants, and the best estimates that could be made by the agents of the United States. That was out of the question now, and the Senate had had the opportunity to provide for the only alternative, that is, a convention between the United States and Great Britain, under which the claims could be adjudicated and the amounts determined. That had been refused. Now the Senator had prevented the Senate considering a proposal for preventing the destruction of the seal herd by a temporary cessation of the slaughter. The responsibility was not a light one. In conclusion, he would say that there was not the slightest ground for the imputation that the Secretary of the Treasury had suppressed the logs of vessels or any other evidence, as a perusal of the letter quoted by the Senator would show.

Mr. MORGAN asked leave to print a statement showing what were the actual liabilities of the United States under the principles contended for by Great Britain.

Objection was made.

Mr. GRAY asked leave to print as part of his remarks the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury referred to.

Mr. MORGAN objected.

P. S.—The letter in question states that the collector of customs at San Francisco had reported that the masters of certain vessels had failed to give the required particulars, having sailed in ignorance of the regulation concerning logs.

No. 42.

Sir J. Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberley.—(Received March 25.)

WASHINGTON, March 15, 1895.

MY LORD: In my dispatch of the 5th instant I had the honor to transmit to your lordship a report of a debate in the Senate on the subject of the Bering Sea claims, in the course of which Senator MORGAN stated that he had prepared a memorandum on the liability of the United States, under the award of the Paris tribunal, to make compensation for the illegal seizure of British sealing vessels in Bering Sea.

He requested leave to print this document in the RECORD as part of his speech, but leave was refused.

After the adjournment of Congress he communicated this memorandum to the press, and I have now the honor to transmit to your lordship an extract from the "New York Daily Tribune," which purports to contain a summary of it.

Senator MORGAN argues that the United States never agreed to arbitrate the question of their liability for damages, nor have ever admitted their liability. They only agreed to negotiate respecting it, expressly reserving the question of such liability as the subject of such negotiation. He is therefore opposed to the creation by act of Congress of a commission to settle the question without any negotiation. The claim of Great Britain is, he states, based on the false assumption that the United States were bound by the award of the tribunal, or by agreement, or by law, justice, or equity to pay any part of the demand.

Senator MORGAN also insists that the "further negotiations" provided for in regard to these claims by Article VIII of the Bering Sea arbitration treaty should take place "through the constitutional authorities of the United States."

On those two points I would observe that no admission of liability became necessary from the moment that the Paris tribunal, by its award, had rejected the legal pretensions of the United States to a special property in the fur seals resorting to the Pribilof Islands. That decision at once proclaimed the illegality of the seizures, and the liability of the United States to satisfy the claims. That was the basis of the diplomatic negotiation for the adjustment of the claims, and I am at a loss to conceive what other view could be taken without disputing the Paris award. Nor can I comprehend, without further explanation, the meaning of Senator MORGAN'S objection to that negotiation as not having taken place "through the constitutional authorities of the United States."

Having denied the liability of the United States to pay compensation, and also the competency of the United States Secretary of State and of the British ambassador to negotiate on the subject, though fully empowered by their respective Governments to do so, Senator MORGAN proceeds to criticise the arrangement arrived at for the payment of a "lump sum" of $425,000.

With regard to the details of the claims, he states that the total amount claimed by Great Britain, with interest, is $542,169. He urges that the items for loss of profits should not be allowed, and he quotes in support of his contention the decision of the Geneva arbitrators on the subject of prospective earnings. He estimates the excess proposed to be allowed by the Secretary of State as fully $182,000. He states, further, that ten of the ships for which damages are claimed were, in fact, owned by citizens of the United States, and that the amount claimed by British subjects, less speculative damages, is only $70,924.

But even this amount is, he states, excessive. He maintains that the "personal claims" should be deducted, leaving $36,289. Of this sum, $16,500, he says, is claimed for the Henrietta, which claim is not allowable, as she was seized under the modus vivendi.

Senator MORGAN'S estimate, therefore, with the last-mentioned deductions, would reduce the indemnity to about $20,000; but that is an improvement on the previous estimate he gave in a recent speech in opposition to the payment of the claims, in which he declared that "not one shilling" was due. (See my dispatch of the 4th instant.)

I will now proceed to show in what respects the distinguished Senator appears to have been misled in his computation of the indemnity.

In the first place, he is mistaken in supposing that the total amount of the claims, with interest, was only $542,169.

It amounted to upward of $786,000, as your lordship will see from the synopsis of the claims which forms inclosure 2 to this dispatch.

The Senator would seem to have taken the total given at page 143 of the Congressional papers on the subject as including interest, but that is not the fact.

Moreover, the case of the Winnifred was subsequently added in order that the whole of the claims arising out of the Bering Sea controversy might be disposed of under the "lump sum" arrangement.

The next misapprehension to which I would call attention relates to the measure of damages.

Senator MORGAN takes exception to the inclusion in the statements of claims of the items for loss of profits of the fishery season.

He would allow no compensation whatever for such losses, and he quotes from the judgment of the tribunal in the Geneva arbitration the well-known passage, to the effect that no compensation can be awarded under the head of "prospective earnings," as they depend "upon future and uncertain contingencies." But he omits to mention that the tribunal did, in fact, take such losses into consideration in awarding a gross sum by way of indemnity.

The tribunal allowed a large amount "in lieu of profits." This is shown by the estimate of damages contained in protocol No. 29 of the Geneva conferences, in which the decision to award the gross sum of $15,500,000 is recorded.

In all similar cases "losses of profits" are properly claimed, for although they may not be recoverable "under that head," they form an element of consideration, according to the circumstances of each case, in computing the award of a gross sum by way of indemnity. That was the view on which the United States Government acted in 1879, when they preferred a claim of $120,000 against Great Britain on behalf of twenty-two American fishing vessels whose fishery operations had been interfered with by mob violence at Fortune Bay, in Newfoundland.

Those claims included damages for loss of profits, calculated on the average of preceding years. Sir Edward Thornton, then Her Majesty's representative at Washington, objected "that these losses were in the nature of consequential or indirect damages, which should not be allowed." But it was insisted, on behalf of the United States Government, that compensation should be paid for those losses, and ultimately Her Majesty's Government awarded a "lump sum," amounting to two-thirds of the original claim, thus allowing a large margin for inflated valuations and doubtful items.

In the present case the lump sum of $425,000, agreed on between the two Governments allows a still larger margin, for if the same proportion of two-thirds had been adopted the lump sum of $425,000 would have been increased by $100,000.

The amount of indemnity originally claimed was reduced by no less than $360,000.

The next objection made by Senator MORGAN is to the "personal claims," but he gives no reason for that objection.

It happens, however, that the damages claimed under that head were extremely moderate, having regard to the character of the acts for which redress is sought, and to the humiliation, losses, and sufferings inflicted on innocent persons in pursuit of their lawful industry.

Senator MORGAN concludes by objecting to the claim of the Henrietta, on the ground that she was seized under the modus vivendi. But the ground of claim is that she was not handed over after seizure to the British authorities, as prescribed by the modus vivendi, and was detained at Sitka until she became valueless from deterioration.

But of all the unfounded objections which have been urged against the claims, that which seems to have made the greatest impression on the public mind is the statement that most of the vessels on behalf of which the claims are made were in fact owned by persons whom Senator MORGAN stigmatized in the Senate as "recalcitrant and rascally Americans, who hired themselves out to the British flag to rob the Government of the United States and to violate its laws and dishonor the country." (See my dispatch of the 4th instant.)

These vituperative epithets are quite unmerited, and I will proceed to show that the objection in question is not well founded in fact, and apparently is based on a mistaken view of the British navigation laws.

By British law no alien can hold any share in a registered British vessel under penalty of forfeiture of the vessel to the Crown.

The owner of the vessel may mortgage her to an alien, but he does not thereby part with his property in the vessel. He only makes her a security for the loan.

Section 70 of the merchant shipping act provides as follows:

"A mortgagee shall not by reason of his mortgage be deemed to be the owner of a ship or any share therein, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be the owner of such mortgaged ship or share, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage debt."

It is not improbable that in some cases the owners of British sealing vessels may have borrowed money from the United States citizens for the purpose of the season's equipment and venture, and that they may have mortgaged their vessels to American citizens as collateral security for the loan.

But they remain liable to the lender for the amount of the loan, though their vessel has been illegally seized and their venture has resulted in a loss, owing to such illegal seizure. On what conceivable ground of justice or reason are they to be deprived of compensation because part of the amount awarded may be applied by them in satisfaction of a loan due by them to an American citizen?

Why should that American citizen be called "a rascal"? What law has he violated by advancing money for the prosecution of a lawful Canadian industry carried on by Canadians in Canadian vessels? In what respect has the United States Government been "robbed," considering that it has no property in the fur seal, as was solemnly adjudged and declared by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris?

These are the questions which, I submit, can only be reasonably answered in a sense absolutely fatal to Senator MORGAN'S contentions.

Moreover, the principal alleged transgressor referred to, whose name is Boscowitz, has denied that he is an American citizen.

The British flag and the law of nations have been violated on the high seas, and it appears to me that in assessing the indemnity to the private individuals who were the victims of the great wrong so committed, any inquiry into the sources of the capital invested in the lawful industry pursued by the vessel at the time of seizure is out of place and inadmissible.

As regards the vessels themselves, even if some of them, as contended by Senator MORGAN, were owned or partly owned by citizens of the United States (which I have shown could not be the case under the law of the flag), such vessels became liable to be forfeited to the British Crown, and the United States Government, by whom they were wrongfully seized, would be bound to restore them or their value to Her Majesty's Government for the purposes of such forfeiture.

It will be seen from the above explanations that Senator MORGAN'S objections to the payment of the "lump sum" agreed upon are based in a great measure on misapprehensions of fact, and, I would add with all respect, on an erroneous view of the rights of Great Britain and of the obligations of the United States resulting from the Bering Sea treaty of arbitration and the Paris award.

As your lordship is aware, Senator MORGAN is the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and was one of the two members representing the United States Government on the Bering Sea Tribunal of Arbitration.

It is not surprising that persistent denunciations from such a quarter against the diplomatic arrangement concluded between the two Governments should have prejudiced Congress and the public against it. Moreover, the great pressure of business and the strong party feeling which marked the close of the session rendered it impossible to obtain a fair and dispassionate consideration of the question

Much as the delay in the final settlement is to be deplored, I have too much confidence in the great qualities of the American people to doubt that it will be ultimately adjusted on a sound and honorable basis.

In a previous dispatch I reminded your lordship of the assurance given to me by Mr. Blaine at the commencement of the negotiations which led to the Paris arbitration, "that his Government would not wish that private individuals who had acted bona fide in the belief that they were exercising their lawful rights should be the victims of a grave dispute between two great countries which had happily been adjusted."

The President and the Secretary of State adopted the same view, and were animated throughout the negotiations for the settlement of the claims by the highest sentiments of honor and justice. I am not without hope that when the cloud which now obscures the true merits of the case has been dispelled, Congress may yet confirm the arrangement made between the two Governments as an equitable and happy solution of a tedious and irritating controversy.

I have, etc., JULIAN PAUNCEFOTE.

Extract from the New York Tribune of March 9, 1895.

[By telegraph to the Tribune.]

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1895.

Chairman MORGAN, of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, was a member of the Bering Sea Tribunal of Arbitration, and there is no man living who possesses a more thorough and accurate knowledge of the matters discussed or the conclusions and awards of the tribunal than he does. It is by no means singular that he should denounce the claims of alleged British subjects on account of damages as "preposterous," in view of the facts which have already been disclosed in the debate in the House of Representatives, as well as in these dispatches. But it is exceedingly significant, to say the least, that Senator MORGAN, a Democrat, should in effect declare that this Administration, and not the Paris Tribunal, is responsible for the slaughter of the seals by poachers during the last two years.

Senator MORGAN'S statement, which is herewith reproduced, strongly suggests either that the Cleveland Administration was hoodwinked by the representatives of Great Britain, whose construction of the decision of the Tribunal of Arbitration was accepted by it, or that it was willing to sacrifice whatever advantage the United States might have gained under that decision for the sake of casting discredit upon the Administration which agreed to submit the matters in controversy to such a tribunal. The statement of Senator MORGAN'S views is as follows:

"A very mistaken view of this matter is entertained. The treaty of arbitration was signed the 29th February, 1892, and the modus vivendi of 1892 was signed on the 18th April of that year. They were ratified by the Senate as parts of the same treaty, and were proclaimed by the President on the same day, the 9th May, 1892. Article VIII of the treaty of February, 1892, says that the high contracting parties, having found themselves unable to agree upon a reference which shall include the question of the liability of each for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the other, or by its citizens, in connection with the claims presented or made by it, and being solicitous that this subordinate question should not interrupt or longer delay the submission and determination of the main question, do agree that either may submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in such claim, and ask for a finding thereon, the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiations. Article V of the treaty of April, 1892, stipulates that if the result of the arbitration be to affirm the right of British sealers to take seals in Bering Sea within the bounds claimed by the United States, then compensation shall be made for abstaining from the exercise of that right during the pendency of the arbitration upon the basis of such a regulated and limited catch as in the opinion of the arbitrators might have been taken without an undue diminution of the seal herd. If the result of the arbitration denied the British rights, then compensation was to be made by Great Britain to the United States. The amount awarded, if any, was to be promptly paid.

"It was not questioned and could not be disputed that the two treaties, though they were signed at different times, constituted one entire agreement. Article VIII of the treaty of February, 1892, only bound the two Governments to a 'further negotiation' as to the matters therein referred to, and left 'the question of the liability of either Government on the facts found to be the subject of further negotiation.' In execution of this article, the agents of the two Governments agreed upon a state of facts which the tribunal found to be true, and entered it of record. That statement of facts included only the names of twenty sealing vessels that were seized by the United States. The tribunal had no authority to pass upon any question touching the liability of the United States for having made such seizures. That matter was left where Article VIII of the treaty left it. The United States has not agreed to arbitrate any such claim or demand, and have never admitted any liability to Great Britain connected with any such claim or demand. They have only agreed to negotiate respecting it, expressly reserving the question of such liability as the subject of such negotiation.

"I am only insisting that the negotiations shall take place through the constitutional authorities of the United States, and that it shall not be evaded by a scheme to create by act of Congress a commission that will settle the question without any negotiation. Judge Blodgett, one of the counsel of the United States, presented an argument before the tribunal to show that upon the widest basis of demand Great Britain had claimed, no decree upon the facts could award Great Britain any damages for alleged wrongs committed by the United States. That argument was not answered, nor was any effort made to answer. It stands to-day as a perfect answer to the claim set up by Great Britain, based upon the false assumption that the United States were bound by the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration, or by agreement, or by law, justice, or equity to pay any part of the demand."

Mr. MORGAN then gave in detail the names of the vessels and the claims made on their behalf, which was the statement he desired to include in the RECORD, but which was shut out by Mr. TURPIE'S objection. The claims showed that the amount claimed by Great Britain with interest was $542,169.26; the amount proposed to be allowed by Secretary Gresham was $425,000. Mr. MORGAN said that the schedule of claims for each vessel contained an item designated variously as "probable catch," "balance of catch," "estimated balance of catch," etc. These were clearly prospective profits or speculative damages, and were all based on future or contingent occurrences, forming no basis of fact on which an equitable finding as to amount of damages could be predicated. They should not be allowed. Similar claims were presented by the United States to the arbitrators of the Alabama claims in 1872 at Geneva, and in their decision they say: "And whereas prospective earnings can not properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of the opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head."

Mr. MORGAN estimated that the excess proposed to be allowed by Secretary Gresham was fully $182,000. He added:

"The above figures and comparisons are based entirely upon the supposition that every vessel included in the schedule of claims submitted by Sir Julian Pauncefote was owned by a British subject. It appears, however, from the United States Counter Case submitted to the Bering Sea Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, that ten vessels were in fact owned by citizens of the United States."

He figured up the general result as follows:

Total amount claimed by Great Britain, $542,169.42; total amount of claims of United States citizens presented, $359,853.89; balance resulting, being amount claimed by British owners, $182,315.53. But of this amount claimed by British subjects, speculative damages are included to the amount of $111,391, thus leaving the amount claimed by British subjects, less speculative damages, $70,924.53. The total amount of claims of British subjects, which, as Mr. MORGAN contends, could possibly be recovered, amounts in all to $70,924. But even this sum, which is $471,244 less than the British claim presented and $354,075 less than the amount the Secretary of State proposes to give in settlement, is undoubtedly excessive. Of that amount $34,636 is for "personal claims," and in all probability some of these claimants are citizens of the United States or some other country, which fact could be estab lished by investigation. Deducting the "personal claims" from $70,924, there is left, as Mr. MORGAN says, $36,289. Of this sum $16,560 appears as the claim of the Henrietta (less speculative damages). The Henrietta was seized in Bering Sea in September, 1892, under the provisions of the modus vivendi, and therefore no claim is allowable. But even if allowable it shows its "padded" character, from the fact that there is a claim for an "estimated catch" in Bering Sea when sealing was not allowed there and the season was over at the time of the seizure.

Senator MORGAN therefore concludes that Great Britain claims the sum of $542,169. and that the amount due, with interest, is only $96,102, making an excess in the claims without interest over the amount due with interest of $446,066. The Secretary of State proposed to allow $425,000, which is by this account, according to Senator MORGAN'S figures, $328,897 in excess of the total amount due to British subjects with the interest computed.

"When the Government of the United States," said Mr. MORGAN, in conclusion, "has made no agreement and no admission of any indebtedness to Great Britain on account of any of these claims, and has not admitted any principle on which the claim of Great Britain is based, I must insist that these matters should be discussed in the negotiations that the two Governments are bound to conduct. I could not agree that speculative profits or damages or personal claims should be included in the accounts, unless that is in accordance with the laws of nations. Such a precedent would soon develop into the most bitter and violent contentions between nations.

"Under Article V of the modus vivendi of 1892 nothing was claimed by either party, and the Tribunal of Arbitration made no award upon that article. It was not proposed, and I, at least, understood that it was abandoned. I have said nothing about the causes that have led to the alleged increased destruction of seals in 1894. I do not credit those statements. I am thoroughly satisfied that if such increased destruction has occurred, or if the number of seals killed was not greatly reduced in 1894 below the number killed in 1891 and 1892, the slaughter is due to the inefficient regulations to carry out the concurrent regulations established in the award of the arbitrators."

The claim of the Winnifred, which occurred in 1891, is added, though the particulars were not furnished. It was agreed that it should be covered by the "lump sum," and as the case is similar to that of the Henrietta, whose claim amounted to a little over $30,000, it was put down roughly at the same amount.

Sir J. Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberley.—(Received March 30.)

WASHINGTON, March 19, 1895.

MY LORD: In my dispatch of the 15th instant I had the honor to lay before your lordship my views on the subject of the refusal by Congress to vote the appropriation of $425,000 in satisfaction of the Bering Sea claims and my observations on the objections raised by Senator MORGAN to the "lump-sum" arrangement. I venture to supplement that dispatch with the following additional remarks on the Senator's statement that the United States Government had never admitted their liability to pay those claims.

I observed in that dispatch that the award of the Paris arbitration proclaimed the illegality of the seizures and the liability of the United States to satisfy the claims. But, if any admission of liability were necessary, it is to be found, at least in principle, in Article V of the modus vivendi of 1892, which was signed contemporaneously with the treaty of arbitration.

Under the modus vivendi of 1891 the British sealers were compensated by their own Government for their loss of profits consequent on their abstention from pelagic sealing during that season.

Under the modus vivendi of 1892 (article 5) it was provided that, if the result of the arbitration should be to affirm the right of the British sealers to take seals in Bering Sea, similar compensation as therein defined should be paid to them by the United States Government.

If the British sealers were thus held entitled to compensation for abstaining from the pursuit of their lawful industry under the above voluntary and amicable arrangement, how much greater is their claim to such compensation for the previous deprivation of their just rights by force and violence. The two Governments, at the arbitration, waived their respective claims to compensation under article 5 of the modus vivendi of 1892, for reasons given in the report of the proceedings of the 31st May (pages 1197-1198). But those reasons in no way militate against my present contention; they rather confirm it.

It is true that, as stated in Article VIII of the treaty of arbitration, the high contracting parties found themselves unable to agreee upon a reference which should include the question of their respective liabilities to each other.

But the reason was not that any dispute arose as to the liability of the United States Government to pay compensation for the illegal seizures of British vessels in the event of the decision of the arbitrators being adverse to them on the question of the jurisdictional rights of the United States. The sole reason for which the high contracting parties found themselves unable to agree on the question of liability was that the United States Government claimed, in the event of the award being in their favor, to render Great Britain liable for losses resulting from the wrongful action of persons sailing outside British jurisdiction under the British flag, a doctrine which it would be impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accept. (See Lord Salisbury's telegram of the 12th of August, 1891.[1])

I may add, in conclusion, that during the negotiations for the "lump-sum" arrangement the Secretary of State entirely shared the views above expressed as to the significance of article 5 of the modus vivendi of 1892 in relation to the measure of damages.

Bering Sea claims convention.

Canadian Government, owing to meeting of Dominion Parliament to-morrow, have decided to postpone resumption of negotiations and visit of their delegates to Washington until after prorogation.

No. 45.

Sir J. Pauncefote to the Earl of Kimberley.—(Received April 25.)

WASHINGTON, April 16, 1895.

MY LORD: With reference to the resumption of negotiations for the Bering Sea claims convention, and to the proposed visit of Canadian delegates to Washington in connection therewith, I have the honor to report that, immediately on receipt of your lordship's telegraphic instructions of the 9th ultimo, I communicated with the Governor-General of Canada as to the date of the visit of the defegates.

On the 18th ultimo the Governor-General replied to the effect that the Canadian Government were most anxious for an early settlement of the Bering Sea claims, and that the ministry were ready to send representatives without delay.

On the 20th ultimo I informed the Governor-General of the readiness of the United States Government to resume negotiations for a treaty to be submitted to the Senate at the next meeting of Congress, but I added that the Secretary of State had not recovered from his recent illness, and that he had been advised to leave Washington for a short time. Nevertheless, Mr. Gresham would proceed at once, if desired, with the negotiations.

I received no further communication from the Governor-General until the 5th instant, when his excellency informed me, by telegram, that his ministers suggested that the conference should take place at once, so as to enable the delegates to return to Ottawa before the meeting of the Dominion Parliament, which would take place on the 18th instant.

Mr. Gresham was then absent from Washington, but I called on him immediately on his return, and I ascertained from him that while the President was quite willing that the negotiations should proceed at once, if such was the desire of the Canadian Government, still, in view of the short time now at the disposal of the delegates before the meeting of Parliament, and of other considerations, he thought it would be of advantage to defer the negotiations to the later period.

I so informed the Governor-General, by telegram, on the 10th instant, and yesterday, the 15th, I received a reply from his excellency, to the effect that, owing to the meeting of the Canadian Parliament on the 18th instant, the Dominion Government prefer to have the visit of their delegates to Washington deferred until after the session.

I have so informed Mr. Gresham.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 31, 1895.

SIR: Your excellency's dispatches of the 28th February last and of the 4th, 5th, 15th, and 19th March relative to the claims for compensation from the United States on account of the seizure of British sealing vessels in Bering Sea were duly received, and have been read with careful attention.

I need scarcely say that the arguments which you bring forward in support of the validity of those claims have the entire approval and concurrence of Her Majesty's Government. The attempt made by Senator MORGAN to dispute them seems to be largely founded on misapprehension, and Her Majesty's Government can not doubt that when the full facts are before the public in the United States the liability of that country to make compensation, which has never been denied by the Government, will be generally recognized both in and outside of Congress.

As your excellency will shortly be returning to your post, I transmit to you herewith, for such use as you may find convenient, a memorandum setting out at somewhat greater length some of the points in support of the claims to which you have alluded in your dispatches above referred to.

I am, etc.,

SALISBURY.

[Inclosure in No. 46.]

Memorandum.

The statement communicated to the press by Senator MORGAN entirely ignores the fact that the five questions submitted to the arbitrators in accordance with Article VI of the treaty of the 29th February, 1892, embodied the whole of the grounds urged on behalf of the United States Government in justification of the seizures out of which the claims arise. This is abundantly clear, not only from the correspondence which led to the framing of these questions, but also from the proceedings of the tribunal.

Mr. Blaine, in the course of his first conversation with Sir J. Pauncefote on the subject of the seal fisheries, as reported in the dispatch to Lord Salisbury of the 1st of November, 1889, stated:

"As regards compensation, if an agreement should be arrived at, he felt sure that his Government would not wish that private individuals who had acted bona fide in the belief that they were exercising their lawful rights should be the victims of a grave dispute between two great countries, which had happily been adjusted. He was not without hope, therefore, that the wishes I had expressed might be met, and that all might be arranged in a manner which should involve no humiliation on either side."

In a subsequent conversation on the subject of compensation on the 26th of December Sir J. Pauncefote reports Mr. Blaine to have stated that "on further consideration he had decided to reply to my protest, in order to place on record before the world the precise grounds upon which the United States Government justify the seizure of the Canadian vessels, so that any compensation which may be granted may not be interpreted as an admission of wrong."

These grounds of justification were accordingly set forth in Mr. Blaine's note to Sir J. Pauncefote of the 22d of January, 1890, and amplified and reiterated in his later notes of the 30th of June and the 17th of December in the same year. In the last of these notes he summed them up in the form of questions for arbitration, which were substantially the questions propounded to the arbitrators and decided by them against the United States.

Though on the face of them these questions do not refer to the question of damages, it is obvious that the arbitrators, in deciding that the grounds upon which the United States based its claim to regulate the seal fisheries were unfounded, at the same time decided that the justification for the seizure of British vessels which was based on these grounds was unfounded.

The seizures were, in fact, formal acts of the United States Government in the exercise of the rights and jurisdiction which they claimed, and the tribunal in declaring that they had no title to such rights and jurisdiction necessarily declared that the loss and injury inflicted on British subjects, in pursuance of those rights and jurisdiction, were unwarranted, and as they also found that the seizures "were made by the authority of the United States Government" their decision was a declaration that the United States Government, having inflicted an unwarranted wrong, were liable to pay compensation for such wrong.

That this was the view of the arbitrators and of those engaged in conducting the case on behalf of the United States Government is clear from the proceedings of the tribunal.

The fifth article of the finding of facts submitted to the tribunal by the United States agent as an alternative to the finding proposed by the British agent, as reported at page 1458 of the proceedings, was "that the said several searches, seizures, condemnations, confiscations, fines, imprisonments, and orders were not made, imposed, or given under any claim or assertion of right or jurisdiction except such as is submitted to the decision of the arbitrators in Article IV of the treaty of arbitration."

The findings finally proposed by the agent of Great Britain and agreed to as proved by the agent for the United States, and submitted to the tribunal for its consideration, and found by them unanimously (including Senator MORGAN, therefore), were as follows:

"Finding of facts proposed by the agent of Great Britain, and agreed to as proved by the agent for the United States, and submitted to the Tribunal of Arbitration for its consideration.

"1. That the several searches and seizures, whether of ships or goods, and the several arrests of masters and crews respectively mentioned in the Schedule to the British Case, pages 1 to 60, inclusive, were made by the authority of the United States Government. The questions as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the schedule to the British case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States, have been withdrawn from and have not been considered by the tribunal, it being understood that it is open to the United States to raise these questions, or any of them, if they think fit, in any future negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay the amounts mentioned in the schedule to the British case.

"2. That the seizures aforesaid, with the exception of the Pathfinder, seized at Neah Bay, were made in Bering Sea at the distances from shore mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto, marked C.

"3. That the said several searches and seizures of vessels were made by public armed vessels of the United States, the commanders of which had, at the several times when they were made, from the executive department of the Government of the United States instructions, a copy of one of which is annexed hereto, marked A, and that the others were in all substantial respects the same. That in all the instances in which were proceedings were had in the district courts of the United States resulting in condemnation, such proceedings were begun by the filing of libels, a copy of one of which is annexed hereto, marked B, and that the libels in the other proceedings were, in all substantial respects, the same; that the alleged acts or offenses for which said several searches and seizures were made were in each case done or committed in Bering Sea at the distances from shore aforesaid; and that in each case in which sentence of condemnation was passed, except in those cases when the vessels were released after condemnation, the seizure was adopted by the Government of the United States; and in those cases in which the vessels were released the seizure was made by the authority of the United States; that the said fines and imprisonments were for alleged breaches of the municipal laws of the United States, which alleged breaches were wholly committed in Bering Sea at the distances from the shore aforesaid.

"4. That the several orders mentioned in the schedule annexed hereto and marked C, warning vessels to leave or not to enter Bering Sea, were made by public armed vessels of the United States, the commanders of which had, at the several times when they were given, like instructions as mentioned in finding 3, and that the vessels so warned were engaged in sealing or prosecuting voyages for that purpose, and that such action was adopted by the Government of the United States.

"5. That the district courts of the United States in which any proceedings were had or taken for the purpose of condemning any vessel seized as mentioned in the Schedule to the Case of Great Britain, pages 1 to 60, inclusive, had all the jurisdiction and powers of courts of admiralty, including the prize jurisdiction, but that in each case the sentence pronounced by the court was based upon the grounds set forth in the libel."[1]

It will be observed from these findings that the question of justification was regarded as conclusively settled by the decision of the five questions, and that the only negotiations contemplated were "negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay the amounts mentioned in the schedule (C) to the British case," not simply negotiations as to the liability of the United States Government to pay compensation at all; and further, that the only reservations made on behalf of the United States Government were "the questions as to the value of the said vessels or their contents, or either of them, and the question as to whether the vessels mentioned in the schedule to the British case, or any of them, were wholly or in part the actual property of citizens of the United States."

The eminent lawyers and statesmen charged with the conduct of the United States case certainly never contemplated that the decision of the arbitrators would not be accepted as concluding the liability of the United States except in regard to the points expressly reserved in the findings of facts.

Mr. MORGAN is alleged to have stated that the argument submitted to the tribunal by Judge Blodgett, one of the United States counsel, "stands to-day as a perfect answer to the claim set up by Great Britain, based upon the false assumption that the United States were bound by the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration, or by agreement, or by law, justice, or equity to pay any part of the demand." But on the very first page of that argument Mr. Blodgett says: "We, however, preface what we have to submit on this feature of the case by saying that, if it shall be held by this tribunal that these seizures and interferences with British vessels were wrong and unjustifiable under the laws and principles applicable thereto, then it would not be becoming in our nation to contest those claims, so far as they are just and within the fair amount of the damages actually sustained by British subjects," and the whole of his argument is in fact devoted to the two points reserved in the findings of fact: the amount of the claims and the nationality of the claimants.

When the question was discussed during the oral argument before the tribunal the same view was clearly expressed by the United States counsel.

The following extract (pages 778–780) from the report of the oral argument will show this, and furnishes an interesting commentary by the official representatives of the United States Government on the recent action of Congress:

"Mr. Justice HARLAN. Suppose this tribunal should decide under the points in Article VI that the United States had or had not any right of property in the seals, and had or had not any right to protect them on the high seas, you would consider the United States bound by that ruling when the two nations, if the occasion arose, got together in negotiations on the question of damages?

"Mr. PHELPS. I should, sir, if you put that question to me at this time.

"Mr. Justice HARLAN. That is what I understand Lord Hannen's question to embrace.

"Mr. PHELPS. If that is the purport of the inquiry, yes. I do not suppose, for instance, that if this tribunal should decide that the United States had no right of property and no right of protection, and that under the circumstances vessels were seized belonging to British subjects, I do not understand that it would be open to the United States after that to insist that there was a right of seizure and a right of protection, in the face of the decision of the tribunal.

"Lord HANNEN. I am bound to say that, assuming that that may be taken as authoritative, it would meet my question.

"The PRESIDENT. And in that case the liability spoken of in Article VIII would merely refer to the question of indemnity, and then there would be no disagreement.

"Mr. PHELPS. That question, as it seems to me, which was put by his lordship, refers rather to the inference that the United States Government would feel itself bound to draw, in respect of the seizure, from the decision of the points of law in respect to the other branches of the case.

"Lord HANNEN. Yes. The object of my inquiry would be completely met if it can be taken as authoritative. We will assume for a moment that the finding would be no property. If that can be tacked on to the finding of facts as to the seizure, then that would meet that which Sir Charles has been asking for, a finding that it was an illegal seizure; and if so, I presume that would satisfy his requirement, as undoubtedly it would meet the view which I intended to indicate in the question I put to you.

"Mr. PHELPS. Your lordship will see that if you ask the opinion of the counsel of the United States what would be the just and right course for the United States Government to pursue in the future negotiations if such were the finding of the tribunal, our answer might be one way. If you ask us if we are authorized here to bind the United States to any conclusion in future negotiations, we must answer that we have no such authority, and have no right to make a declaration that would bind them.

"Lord HANNEN. That is why I put in the word 'authoritative.'

"Mr. PHELPS. We are not authorized to make any such statement or to give any such assurance. I am free to say, and I believe that to be the view of my associates, that after a finding by the tribunal upon the five questions involved, it would not seem to me becoming on the part of the United States, who have agreed to abide by this award, to contradict the award when the question of its propriety arose upon this subordinate matter of seizure; but it must be a question for those who control the diplomatic relations of our Government, and is not a question that we are authorized in reference to.

[1] These grounds were "that the said vessel or schooner was found engaged in killing fur seal within the limits of Alaska Territory and in the waters thereof, in violation of section 1956 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

"The PRESIDENT. That is all very well, Mr. Phelps, but we have here the United States before us in the persons of their agent and counsel, and we have the right to ask them what is the authoritative and official interpretation put by the United States upon one word used in an article of a treaty which limits our powers. We have the right to ask you what is the interpretation put by the United States upon those words 'question of liability.'

"Mr. PHELPS. That question the tribunal is quite entitled to put, and that question we are quite ready to answer. We have endeavored to answer it; that in the discussion of questions under Article VIII the tribunal is invested with no authority whatever except to find the facts, leaving the legal consequences of those facts, so far as these seizures are concerned, for future consideration.

"Then if the tribunal goes further, and asks me what that future consideration on the part of the United States Government would be, I reply in the first place that I have no doubt that it ought to regard the decision of the tribunal as conclusive upon the questions arising under this treaty, but that I am not authorized to go beyond this arbitration and the power with which the tribunal is invested under this article, and give an authoritative assurance as to what those in charge of the United States Government when that time comes may do. The distinction may be a refined one, but it is one that we feel compelled to make.

"The PRESIDENT. We understand that very well. We merely wanted to know what was your interpretation of these words 'questions of liability.' We know the interpretation of the English Government.

"Mr. PHELPS. Our interpretation of that is, as I have said, that Article VIII simply provides for the finding of such facts—material facts, of course—as either party may desire to have found and may offer sufficient evidence in support of. What consequences shall come from that finding is a point that it seems to us is not submitted to this tribunal. It will be for the after consideration of the Government. But I should not seriously doubt, when you ask my opinion, when those points come to be considered hereafter by the United States Government, that the decision of the tribunal upon the first five questions will be respected there as elsewhere."

In his criticisms of the amount of the claims, Mr. MORGAN is alleged to have stated: "The schedule of claims for each vessel contained an item designated variously as 'probable catch,' 'balance of catch,' 'estimated balance of catch,'" etc. These were clearly prospective profits or speculative damages, and were all based on future or contingent occurrences, forming no basis of fact on which an equitable finding as to amount of damages could be predicated. They should not be allowed. Similar claims were presented by the United States to the arbitrators of the Alabama claims in 1872 at Geneva, and in their decision they say: "And whereas prospective earnings can not properly be made the subject of compensation, inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head."

Mr. MORGAN omits, however, to add that in the award of a gross sum to the United States the arbitrators allowed in lieu of the claim for prospective catch one year's wages and 25 per cent on the value of the vessels and their outfits. This is clear from the twenty-ninth protocol of the proceedings of the tribunal, and is shown in detail in the statement inclosed in Lord Tenterden's dispatch of the 9th September, 1872, setting forth how the gross award of $15,500,000 was arrived at. That statement, after setting forth the gross amount of the American claims, thus—

Claims for losses by insurgent cruisers (including the new claims for wages, etc.)	$14,437,143
Prospective catch, if allowed an additional sum of	3,511,035
Claims for pursuit and capture	6,735,063
	24,683,061
With interest at 7 per cent, which, taken for nine years, would amount to	15,550,464
Total	40,233,715

proceeds as follows:

"The tribunal disallowed the claims for pursuit and capture and for prospective catch.

"They further disallowed:

The claims for gross freight	$1,007,153
Double claims	1,682,243
And may further be assumed to have disregarded the new claims to the amount of	1,450,000
Making a further reduction from the American claim of $14,437,144 of	4,139,396
And leaving a balance of	10,297,748
Taking a mean between this and the British estimate of $7,464,784, the result is	8,881,266

"To this must be added two allowances made by the tribunal:

In lieu of prospective catch, one year's wages and 25 per cent on the value of the vessels	988,000
In lieu of the claims for gross freight, 50 per cent of the claims as net freight	503,576
Total	10,372,842
Which, with interest at 6 per cent for about eight years, gives a result of	15,500,000

"As actually arrived at by the tribunal."

The claims in respect of which this "allowance in lieu of prospective catch" was made were on behalf of whalers, whose industry is still more speculative and uncertain than that of the sealers, and the observations of the British arbitrator, Sir A. Cockburn, on that part of the award form a striking contrast to the statements attributed to Senator MORGAN. At page 253 of the reasons for dissenting from the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration, he says: "But, independently of the undeniably exaggerated amount of the claims, a demand for gross prospective earnings, as distinguished from net earnings, is quite incapable of being maintained. This is admitted in the argument of the United States and is clearly demonstrated in the British report. According to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the only allowance which ought to be made in respect of prospective catch is in the nature of interest from the time of the destruction of the vessel. I should myself be disposed to adopt a more liberal mode of compensation, and to award for prospective profits a reasonable percentage on the values of the vessels and outfits," etc.

The Fortune Bay claims to which Sir J. Pauncefote alludes in his dispatch of the 28th February were almost entirely claims for prospective damages. Of the total amount of $103,000, claimed by the United States in that case, only $1,400 was for actual destruction of property. (Report of Judge Bennett, page 3 of chapter 3762, 1883.) The American vessels were only interfered with on one day, yet they claimed for the whole season's profits, and the profit claim was based, not, as in the British Bering Sea claims, on the actual results of the season interrupted, but on the profits of previous years, though the season of 1878 was an exceptionally bad one (page 2 of chapter 3762 of 1883). The action which gave rise to the claims was not that of the British Government, but of a mob of fishermen in an outlying part of the colony, enraged at seeing the laws to which they themselves were subject violated by their competitors. The American vessels claiming largely employed natives of Newfoundland in their vessels, and though these as British subjects were unquestionably amenable for violation of the laws of Newfoundland by fishing on Sunday, the British Government took no exception to the American claims on that ground.

But although the American claims were almost entirely for prospective damages, though they arose largely from the violation of British laws by British subjects employed by United States citizens, though they claimed for a whole season when they were only interfered with on one single day, and though, if the claims were valid, the claimants had a legal remedy in the courts of the colony against the perpetrators of the alleged loss and damage, for which the British Government were in no way responsible, yet the British Government, within three years from the date of the claims arising, paid practically the whole sum demanded by the United States Government, amounting to three-fourths of the claims actually put forward by the claimants.

The Bering Sea claims arise out of the direct action of the United States Government—action declared by an international tribunal to be entirely unjustifiable. They are made out, not for profits based on the results of profitable seasons, but on the actual results of the seasons in which they arose. Some of the claimants not only lost their property, but suffered a rigorous imprisonment in a severe climate.

The arrangement made between the two Governments for the payment of a lump sum amounting to little more than half of the claims preferred, without any allowance whatever for interest, can not be regarded as otherwise than a settlement favorable to the United States, bearing in mind that the claims had already been outstanding for ten years and that more than a year had elapsed since the decision of the arbitrators had been given.

It is not easy to believe that if the late Congress had been fully acquainted with the circumstances it would have refused its sanction to so reasonable a proposal, recommended as it was by the Federal Government, or would have declined even an appropriation for the payment of the claims, subject to their examination by a commission to be appointed for that purpose, or for the simple expenses of such a commission.

APPENDIX No. 2.

FIFTH.—CLAIMS FOR COMPENSATION.

I.—DAMAGES CLAIMED BY THE UNITED STATES.

It is provided in Article VIII of the treaty that either party may submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in any claim it may have against the other, and ask for a finding thereon, "the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiation."

As the undersigned construes this paragraph, it limits the range of inquiry by the tribunal to facts which bear only upon the amount of the claims submitted, as the question of liability is left open to be settled by negotiation.

And in the fifth article of the modus vivendi of May 9, 1892,[1] it is provided that—

"If the result of the arbitration be to affirm the right of British sealers to take seals in the Bering Sea within the bounds claimed by the United States under its purchase from Russia, then compensation shall be made by the United States to Great Britain (for the use of her subjects) for abstaining from the exercise of that right during the pendency of the arbitration, upon the basis of such a regulated and limited catch or catches as in the opinion of the arbitrators might have been taken without an undue diminution of the seal herds; and, on the other hand, if the result of the arbitration shall be to deny the right of British sealers to take seals within said waters, then compensation shall be made by Great Britain to the United States (for its citizens and lessees) for this agreement to limit the island catch to 7,500 a season, upon the basis of the difference between this number and such larger catch as, in the opinion of the arbitrators, may have been taken without an undue diminution of the seal herds."

This leaves the number of seals which might have been taken in the Bering Sea by the British sealers, and upon the Pribilof Islands by the lessees of the United States, without danger of reducing the seal herd, wholly to the judgment of the tribunal under the proofs submitted.

In the printed case submitted on behalf of the United States a claim is presented under the clause last quoted for compensation to the United States for the increased amount of rental which the United States would have received upon an additional number of skins taken, and for a bonus of $9.62½ on each skin, to be paid by the lessees of the islands, over and above the bonus upon the 7,500 skins which are permitted to be taken under the modus vivendi.[2] And a claim is also submitted by the United States in behalf of its lessees for the profit the lessees would have made upon an increased number of seals which might have been taken above the 7,500 but for the modus vivendi.[3]

The case also submits a claim in behalf of the United States and lessees for compensation for the limited number of seals taken under the modus vivendi of 1891.

Frankness requires us, as we think, to say that the proofs which appear in the Counter Case of the United States as to the condition of the seal herd on the Pribilof Islands show that the United States could not have allowed its lessees to have much, if any, exceeded the number of skins allowed by the modus vivendi of 1892 without an undue diminution of the seal herd, and upon this branch of the case we simply call the attention of the tribunal to the proofs and submit the questions to its decision.

As to the claims submitted in behalf of the United States and its lessees under the modus vivendi of 1891, the undersigned also feels constrained to say that, as no provision for the payment of compensation to either party is provided for in that agreement, and as, under the laws of the United States and lease of the islands by the United States to the North American Commercial Company, the United States had the full power, through its Secretary of the Treasury, to limit the catch in any year to such number as in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury might seem proper, we must admit that no right of compensation accrued under that agreement to either the United States or its lessees, for the reason that the agreement was wholly voluntary and such as the two Governments were entirely competent to make, and no right to compensation would accrue to either Government or its citizens unless specially provided for in the modus vivendi.

II.—DAMAGES CLAIMED BY GREAT BRITAIN.

The claims submitted on the part of Great Britain are for damages sustained by certain of its subjects by reason of the seizure by the United States of certain vessels alleged to belong to such subjects, and warning certain British vessels engaged in sealing not to enter Bering Sea, and notifying certain other British vessels engaged in the capture of seals in Bering Sea to leave said sea, whereby it is insisted that the owners of such vessels sustained losses and damages, as set forth in the respective claims, these claims being stated in detail in the "Schedule of particulars" of said claims appended to the British Case.

[2] Case of the United States, pp. 286–289.
[3] Ibid., pp. 289–291.

The right and authority of the United States to protect the seal herd which has its home in the Pribilof Islands, and in the exercise of such right to make reprisal of seal skins wrongfully taken, and to seize and, if necessary, forfeit the vessels and other property employed in such unlawful and destructive pursuit, is a necessary incident to the right asserted by the United States to an exclusive property interest in said seals and the industry established at the sealeries.

We, however, preface what we have to submit on this feature of the case by saying that if it shall be held by this tribunal that these seizures and interferences with British vessels were wrong and unjustifiable under the laws and principles applicable thereto, then it would not be becoming in our nation to contest those claims, so far as they are just and within the fair amount of the damages actually sustained by British subjects.

And, even if it shall be decided by this tribunal that the United States were not justifiable, under the circumstances and the law, in making such seizures and interfering with British subjects in the pursuit and capture of fur seals in the Bering Sea, still that decision would furnish no ground for claims based on wholly illegal and untenable grounds, nor for extortionate demands.

The actual damages sustained by these British subjects, in behalf of whom these claims are presented by the British Government, must undoubtedly be finally settled, according to the terms of the treaty, by negotiations hereafter to be had; but, as findings of fact in regard to these claims are asked for, our purpose in this part of the argument is to call attention to some of the elements which go to make up these claims, and show, as we think, conclusively, that such elements can not enter into claims for compensation against the United States under the treaty.

And we contend—

First. That only claims properly due to subjects of Great Britain should be submitted on the part of that nation and findings of facts asked in relation thereto; and in the application of this principle we insist that it is shown by the Counter Case of the United States and the appendix thereto that the schooner W. P. Sayward and the steam schooners Thornton, Anna Beck, Grace, and Dolphin, with all their supplies and outfits, were in fact owned by one Joseph Boscowitz, a citizen of the United States at the time these vessels were respectively seized by the United States officers;[1] that for some time prior to the fall of 1885 said schooner and steam schooners had been engaged in the sealing business in the joint interest of said Boscowitz and one James Douglas Warren; that Warren had no capital, and, although nominally interested in said vessels and their catch as half owner, yet in fact the money representing his share in the vessels was loaned to him by Boscowitz and secured by mortgages to Boscowitz on the vessels; that in the fall of 1885 Warren became insolvent and made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and, in order to transfer the title to these vessels, a sale of them was made under the Boscowitz mortgages, and one Thomas H. Cooper bid the vessels off at such sale for the sum of $1, Cooper being a brother-in-law of Warren and a British subject, residing in San Francisco, Cal.; that on becoming such purchaser Cooper executed mortgages to Boscowitz on the vessels for their full value, which mortgages Boscowitz held at the time of the seizures, the whole transaction being had solely for the purpose of securing a British registration for said vessels, and thereby enabling Boscowitz and Warren to carry on the sealing business under the British flag.[2]

The testimony showing Boscowitz was a citizen of the United States is found in the affidavits of T. T. Williams[3] and a report of Levi W. Myers, United States consul at Victoria, British Columbia, dated November 10, 1892.[4] While the proof as to the relations between Boscowitz and Cooper is found in the deposition of Thomas H. Cooper, the alleged owner of the said vessels;[5] and the relations between Boscowitz and Warren are shown in the testimony of Boscowitz and Warren, and the pleadings and decrees in the case of Warren vs. Boscowitz and the cross case of Boscowitz vs. Warren in the courts of British Columbia.[6]

The proof also shows that the schooners Carolina and Pathfinder, with their supplies and outfits, were, in fact, owned at the time they were seized by one A. J. Bechtel, a citizen of the United States (see deposition of W. H. Williams,[7] and a report of Levi W. Myers, United States consul at Victoria, British Columbia[8]), although said vessels were registered in the names of British subjects.[9]

And that the schooners Alfred Adams, Black Diamond, and Lily were in fact owned at the time they were respectively seized by one A. Frank, a citizen of the United States (see deposition of T. T. Williams),[10] although registered in the names of British subjects.[11]

It will be seen by looking over the list of vessels alleged to have been seized or interfered with that the list contains twenty vessels, but that two of the vessels named in that list, the Triumph and the Pathfinder, were seized or interfered with twice[12]; so that, in fact, the schedule contains the names of only eighteen separate vessels in regard to which claims are made, and of these eighteen, ten of them were owned by citizens of the United States.

It is assumed on the part of the United States that if the proof submitted shows that these ten vessels were really the property of citizens of the United States, although they had a nominal registry in the names of British subjects, such demonstration will be sufficient to justify a finding by the tribunal that no citizen of Great Britain has sustained damage by the seizure of the Sayward, Anna Beck, Thornton, Grace, Dolphin, Carolina, Pathfinder, Alfred Adams, Black Diamond, and Lily.

We therefore confidently ask and expect the decision and finding of the tribunal that these claims do not belong to British subjects, and for that reason the tribunal can not be called upon to find any facts respecting them.

To justify a finding upon a claim, it must be made to appear affirmatively, by a clear preponderance of proof, that the claim is owned by one of the Governments parties to this arbitration, or to a citizen or subject of such Government.[13]

[13] Article VIII of Treaty of Arbitration.

We insist that we may, with propriety, go farther and say that if there is even doubt that a claimant is a citizen of the nation that presents a claim in his behalf that doubt should of itself be enough to preclude any finding of facts involved in such claim.

The powers and jurisdiction of this tribunal are delegated to it by the treaty, which is in itself but a contract or agreement, and its terms can not be enlarged or amplified by construction.

In taking this ground we do not intend to cast any aspersion upon the good faith of the British Government or its agent for having presented these claims, as we admit that on the face of the claims as presented they appear to be in favor of British subjects. But we do insist that it is right for this tribunal to go behind the face of the papers and ascertain, from proofs furnished, whether or not the persons to be benefited by the allowance or payment of these claims are in fact British subjects, and that no facts should be found involved in any claim where there is even good ground for doubt that such claim belongs to a British subject.

Second. All these claims but two (the Triumph, No. 11,[1] and the Pathfinder, No. 20,[2] of schedule) contain an item for "loss of probable catch," "loss of estimated catch," "balance of probable catch," "probable catch," etc.[3]

All of which will more fully appear by the following tabulated statement:

No. 1.	Carolina, estimated catch	$16,667
No. 2.	Thornton, estimated catch	16,667
No. 3.	Onward, estimated catch	16,667
No. 4.	Favorite, estimated loss of catch	7,000
No. 5.	Sayward, probable catch of 1887	19,250
No. 6.	Grace, probable catch	23,100
No. 7.	Anna Beck, probable catch	17,323
No. 8.	Dolphin, probable catch	24,750
No. 9.	Alfred Adams, probable catch	19,250
No. 10.	Ada, probable catch	15,818
No. 12.	Juniata, estimated catch	9,424
No. 13.	Pathfinder, estimated catch	15,363
No. 14.	Triumph, estimated catch	19,424
No. 15.	Black Diamond, estimated catch	16,192
No. 16.	Lily, balance of catch	14,136
No. 17.	Ariel, balance of estimated catch	9,248
No. 18.	Kate, balance of catch	10,960
No. 19.	Minnie, balance of catch	16,112
		357,353

All these items are subject to the objection that they are prospective profits, uncertain and contingent in their nature, and can not be made the basis of a claim for compensation to the owners of these vessels.

In Sedgwick, on the "Measure of damages," page 69, sixth American edition, it is said:

"The early cases in both the English and American courts generally concurred in denying profits as any part of the damage to be compensated, whether in cases of contract or tort."

In a case for illegal capture, where one of the items of the claim for damages was the profits on the voyage broken up by the capture, the court said:

"Independent, however, of all authority, I am satisfied upon principle that an allowance of damages upon the basis of a calculation of profits is inadmissible. The rule would be in the highest degree unfavorable to the interests of the community. The subject would be involved in utter uncertainty. The calculation would proceed upon contingencies and would require a knowledge of foreign markets to an exactness in point of time and value, which would sometimes present embarrassing obstacles. Much would depend upon the length of the voyage and the season of the arrival; much upon the vigilance and activity of the master, and much upon the momentary demand. After all, it would be a calculation upon conjecture and not upon facts."[4]

In the case of the Amiable Nancy, Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the United States Supreme Court, said:

"Another item is $3,500 for the loss of the supposed profits of the voyage on which the Amiable Nancy was originally bound. In the opinion of the court, this item also was properly rejected. The probable or possible benefits of a voyage as yet in fieri can never afford a safe rule by which to estimate damages in cases of a marine trespass. There is so much uncertainty in the rule itself, so many contingencies which may vary or extinguish its application, and so many difficulties in sustaining its legal correctness, that the court can not believe it proper to entertain it. In several cases in this court the claim for profits has been expressly overruled; and in Del Col vs. Arnold (3 Dall., 333) and The Anna Maria (2 Wheat., 327) it was, after strict consideration, held that the prime cost, or value of the property lost, at the time of the loss, and in case of injury, the diminution in value by reason of the injury, with interest upon such valuation, afforded the true measure for assessing damages. This rule may not secure a complete indemnity for all possible injuries; but it has certainty and general applicability to recommend it, and, in almost all cases, will give a fair and just recompense."[5]

And in Wood's Mayne on Damages,[6] the author, speaking of damages in cases of tort, says:

"In general, however, injuries to property, where unaccompanied by malice, and especially where they take place under a fancied right, are only visited with damages proportionate to the actual pecuniary loss sustained."

While it is conceded that there has been some relaxation of the rigid rule of the early cases in England and the United States in regard to the allowance of profits as an element for the award of damages or compensation, it is undoubtedly still the rule in both countries that profits can only be allowed as damages where they are in the contemplation of parties, in cases arising on contract, and where they are the necessary and proximate result of the injury in cases of tort, and in those latter cases only where they can be proven or established with substantial certainty.[7]

These vessels were all engaged in a hazardous voyage upon the boisterous waters of the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea, subject to all the perils of the sea, and the mind can hardly conceive any event more uncertain and contingent than the number of seals they would have captured if they pursued their voyages unmolested. Shipwreck and every other element of uncertainty, including the proverbial uncertainty which is always an element in fishing and hunting expeditions, would seem to attend all such ventures, and the cogent reasoning of Mr. Justice Story in the cases just cited seems unqualifiedly applicable to the items of "probable catch," etc., presented in this schedule of claims.

The tribunal will bear in mind that the United States do not occupy the position of a tort feasor, subject to exemplary or vindictive damages. "The king [sovereign] can do no wrong." The acts in respect to which compensation is asked in behalf of these British subjects were performed by the United States in the exercise of its sovereignty, and the execution of its statutory laws, and no malice or other unjust motive can be imputed to those acts.

Among the claims presented by the United States in behalf of its citizens to the Tribunal of Arbitration upon the Alabama claims, which met at Geneva in 1872, under the treaty between Great Britain and the United States, were a large number of claims like those now under consideration, for the prospective earnings of ships destroyed by the rebel cruisers in the late civil war of the United States, and that tribunal, by the unanimous vote of its members, said in regard to such claims:

"And whereas prospective earnings can not properly be made the subject of compensation inasmuch as they depend in their nature upon future and uncertain contingencies, the tribunal is unanimously of opinion that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head."[1]

It is therefore respectfully submitted that the rule of decision adopted in the case of the Alabama claims is well established in the jurisprudence of the two nations now at the bar of this high tribunal; and in the light of the authorities cited the undersigned respectfully insists that the items in these claims for "probable catch," "estimated catch," etc., which amount in the aggregate to over two-thirds of the grand total of the claims presented, must be considered as wholly speculative and so uncertain that Great Britain is not entitled to any finding as to any fact involved therein, except the fact of their uncertainty, which appears on the face of the claims themselves.

In the claims growing out of the seizures of the Carolina, Thornton, Onward, Sayward, Grace, Anna Beck, Dolphin, and Ada there are also items for the future earnings of those vessels,[2] namely:

No. 1, Carolina, seized 1886:
Claims for earnings in 1887	$5,000
Claims for earnings in 1888	5,000
No. 2, Thornton, seized in 1886:
Claims for estimated loss to owner by detention in 1887	5,000
Claims for estimated loss to owner by detention in 1888	5,000
No. 3, Onward, seized in 1886:
Claims reasonable profit for season of 1887	5,000
Claims reasonable profit for season of 1888	5,000
No. 5, Sayward, seized in 1887:
Claims for earnings in coasting trade in fall of 1887	1,200
Earnings for season of 1888	6,000
No. 6, Grace, seized in 1887:
Claims for probable earnings in fall of 1887	2,000
Claims for probable earnings in season of 1888	7,000
No. 7, Anna Beck, seized in 1887:
Claims for probable earnings in coasting trade in fall of 1887	2,000
For probable net earnings in season of 1888	6,000
No. 8, Dolphin, seized in 1887:
Claims for probable earnings in fall of 1887	2,000
Claims for probable net earnings in season of 1888	7,000
No. 10, Ada, seized in 1887:
Probable earnings in fall of 1887	2,000
Probable earnings for season of 1888	6,000
Total	71,200

These items, it will be noticed, are in addition to the items of "probable catch" or "estimated catch" for the seasons in which the respective vessels were seized.

Nothing can more fully illustrate the wholly speculative character of this class of claims than a consideration of these items in the light of the indisputable facts.

The Carolina, Thornton, Onward, Grace, Anna Beck, Dolphin, and Ada were seized and decrees of forfeiture rendered against them by the United States district court for the district of Alaska, and the Carolina, Onward, and Thornton were left to go to pieces in the harbor of Unalaska;[3] and the Dolphin, Grace, Anna Beck, and Ada were sold under decrees of that court, while the Sayward was released on a bond given by her owners a year or more after the decree of forfeiture was entered.

These seizures were in effect a conversion of these vessels at the time of the seizure, and, with the exception of the Sayward, their capacity to earn anything for their owners ended with the seizure. The measure of compensation to the owners was therefore the value of the property taken at the time it was taken, perhaps with interest from the time of taking. The owners were dispossessed by the seizure, and their interest in the property merged in their claim for compensation, if they have any such claim; and no claim can therefore accrue to them for the possible future earnings of the vessels.[4]

In Sutherland on Damages, Volume I, page 173 (now a standard authority in the courts of the United States), the rule is stated as follows:

"The value of the property constitutes the measure or an element of damages in a great variety of cases both of tort and contract; and where there are no such aggravations as call for or justify exemplary damages, in actions in which such damages are recoverable the value is ascertained and adopted as the measure of compensation for being deprived of the property, the same in actions of tort as in actions upon contract. In both cases the value is the legal and fixed measure of damages and not discretionary with the jury. * * * And, moreover, the value is fixed in each instance on similar considerations at the time when, by the defendant's fault, the loss culminates. (Grand Tower Co. vs. Phillips, 23 Wall., 471; Owen vs. Routh, 14 C. B., 327.)"

To recapitulate: None of the items of these several claims for "estimated catch" or "probable catch" for the season or voyage in which the seizures took place can be considered, because they are in the nature of prospective profits and fall within the rule adopted by the tribunal in the Alabama Claims and the other authorities cited; and all the items for the probable earnings of these arrested vessels subsequent to the seizure fall within the same objection of uncertainty and contingency, and the further objection that the conversion of the property was completed by the seizure and the owners' only remedy was for the value of the property so seized at the time of the seizure.

But if the tribunal for any reasons shall deem itself required to pass upon these items or find any facts involved therein, except that of their invalidity, we then briefly submit that the "estimated" and "probable catches" are altogether overstated and extravagant.

In the declaration of James Douglas Warren, in support of the claims in behalf of the alleged owner of the Sayward, Anna Beck, Grace, and Dolphin, he states that the estimate is made on the basis of 350 skins taken by each boat and canoe for the full season.[1]

In the report of the British commissioners, forming part of the British case,[2] it is shown that the average catch per canoe or boat for the British sealers for the same year was 164 seals, or less than one-half of Captain Warren's average; and in the same paragraph the British commissioners say:

"The actual success of individual sealing vessels of course depends so largely upon the good fortune or good judgment which may enable them to fall in with and follow considerable bodies of seals, as well as on the weather experienced, that the figures representing the catch compared to the boats or whole number of men employed constitute a more trustworthy criterion than any general statements."[3]

We may, therefore, safely say that if conjecture, based upon any rule of averages, is to be resorted to for the purpose of attempting to approximate the probable catches of these vessels, the British Commissioners have given far more reliable data than that furnished by these claimants.

The fallacy of these "estimates" is also shown in another way. We open the Schedule of the British Claims at random and take the claim growing out of the seizure of the Minnie, No. 19.[4] It seems, from the declaration accompanying the claim that she left Victoria the fore part of May on a sealing voyage in the North Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea. She entered Bering Sea on the 27th of June, at which time she had caught 150 seals. She hunted seals in the Bering Sea until July 15, during which time she had taken 270 skins, which was at the rate of 15 skins per day. She was seized on the 15th of July, leaving her sixteen days of July and sixteen in August, making thirty-two days in all of her sealing season, during which time she would have caught, at the rate of 15 per day, 480 seals, to which adding the 420 she had taken previously, makes a total catch for the sealing season of 900, while her "estimated catch" is 2,500 seals for the season.

Take also the claim of the Ada, No. 10.[5] She entered Bering Sea, as is shown by the declaration accompanying the claim, about the 16th day of July, 1887, and continued sealing in the said sea until the 25th day of August, which was beyond the time when skins taken are considered merchantable,[6] and within two weeks of the time when, as the British Commissioners admit,[7] the sealing season closes, and yet her entire catch up to that time was only 1,876 skins, while the "estimated" or "probable catch" is put at 2,876.

The value and tonnage of these vessels are also largely overstated, as is shown by the tables submitted with the Counter Case of the United States,[8] and the value of several of the vessels seized was ascertained by sworn appraisers of the district court of Alaska and shown to be much lower than the value stated in this schedule of claims.[9] That these appraisals were fair and showed the substantial and fair value of the property is evidenced by the fact that, although the owners of the vessels had the privilege of releasing them upon bonds, none of them, except the Sayward, were so released, although application was made to have their valuation reduced in order that the owners might give bonds.[10]

We might follow the analysis of different items of these claims and successfully show that they are all very much exaggerated, but do not deem it necessary to do so, because we feel sure the members of this tribunal will take notice of the fact that individuals in making claims against a Government, whether it be their own or a foreign Government, invariably expand these claims to the largest amount their consciences will possibly tolerate.

APPENDIX No. 3.

No. 129.

Mr. Foster to Mr. Gresham.

AGENCY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, August 17, 1893.

SIR: In fulfillment of what I regard as my duty before terminating my services as agent, to wit, to place my Government in possession of all information I have acquired which may be useful in future negotiations or action connected with the fur-seal arbitration, I direct attention to the subject of the British claims for damages on account of the seizure of certain vessels in Bering Sea in 1886, 1887, and 1889.

It will be seen from the decision of the tribunal that a finding of facts, agreed upon by counsel, was rendered in accordance with Article VIII of the treaty. This finding will be found to relate entirely to the facts of the seizures, and, as agreed to by counsel, did not in any manner involve the question of liability or the value or ownership of the vessels. By reference to Protocol XXX, of May 31, it will be seen that the British Government has withdrawn all claim for damages under Article V of the modus vivendi of 1892. In further confirmation of this I inclose the statement of the British consul before the tribunal on the subject.

In view of these facts it would seem that the only question of damages open for the consideration of the two Governments was that arising out of the seizure of vessels in Bering Sea. The claims on this account as presented by the British Government will be found in the schedule of claims annexed to and bound with the British Case, and on page 315 of the British Counter Case.

The defense of the United States, so far as it was thought necessary to make one under Article VIII of the treaty, will be found in the United States Counter Case, pages 129 to 135, and the evidence there cited, contained in the appendix thereto, as also in the printed United States Argument, pages 215 to 227.

The total amount of the British claim, as presented at page 60 of the Schedule of Claims, is $439,171, of which $357,353 consists of a claim for prospective earnings, which I suggest can not be properly asserted, for the reasons set forth in the United States Argument.

It will appear from an examination of the evidence in the case and counter case of the United States that most of the vessels appear in reality to be the property of American citizens. Further and more searching investigation may show that others of the vessels were the property of our citizens. In this connection I refer to a correspondence at Paris had by me with the British agent in reference to the citizenship of Boscowitz, owner or mortgagee of several of these vessels.

I also inclose a memorandum in regard to the value of several of the seized vessels, which may be of service in the further examination of these claims.

Mr. Robert Lansing, associate counsel in the arbitration, made a visit in 1892 to Victoria and San Francisco for the purpose of collecting evidence in relation to this branch of the case, and I have no doubt he would cheerfully go to Washington at any time, if you or the person having charge of the Government's interests in this matter should think it desirable to confer with him.

I am, etc.,

JOHN W. FOSTER.

Mr. MORGAN. I am sorry to detain the Senate at such an unreasonable hour, but unless some Senator desires to debate the resolution I ask that it may be now voted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be again read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the resolution read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will again be read.

The resolution was again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg leave to place on file the correspondence respecting claims for compensation on account of British vessels seized in Bering Sea by United States cruisers, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so referred in the absence of objection.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 10, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 9, 1895.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 9, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

SECTION 2601, REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] presents a proposition, which will be read, after which he asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, before it is read I desire to make the same inquiry that I made on Friday last in relation to a resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. I am wholly unacquainted with the contents of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, as I was with the purpose of the one submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I desire to ask the Chair now, as I did in that case, whether the reading of the proposition to the House necessarily carries it into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this is a business proposition.

Mr. CRISP. I will merely add that my inquiry was directed to the practice and not to the proposition itself.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2601, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2601. There shall be, in the States of Indiana and Illinois, one collection district, as follows: The district of Chicago, to comprise the State of Illinois and the waters and shores of Lake Michigan within the State of Indiana, in which Chicago shall be the port of entry, and Waukegan and Michigan City ports of delivery: Provided, That all present ports of delivery in the State of Illinois now a part of the New Orleans district shall be ports of delivery in the new district of Illinois, and shall have all privileges which they have under existing law."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, that ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman hear me a moment before he objects?

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the House the gentleman from Illinois can be heard, and then the question of objection can be submitted.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire especially to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to this section of the statutes as it stands now. It is as follows:

There shall be in the State of Indiana and Illinois one collection district, as follows: The district of Chicago, to comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Michigan within the States of Indiana and Illinois, in which Chicago shall be the port of entry and Waukegan and Michigan City the ports of delivery.

Now, under that statute the district of which Chicago is the port of entry does not comprise the whole State of Illinois, and my reason for offering this bill at the present time is this: The Chicago and Aurora Smelting Company have occasion to import large quantities of ore from Canada and Mexico; their warehouse is at Aurora, 36 miles from Chicago. Under the existing law the collection port for Aurora is New Orleans. The object of this bill is simply that the collection district of which Chicago is the port of entry shall be extended over the State of Illinois, without making any other change whatever. It is not proposed to create any new office or to make any other change in existing law than to permit those people who are smelting and refining at Aurora to pay their collection dues at the city of Chicago. This matter has been brought to the attention of the Treasury Department, and the officials there concur fully in the propriety of passing the bill I have presented. This morning I submitted the matter both to the collection department and also to Mr. Hamlin, who gave me permission to state to the Speaker and to members of the House that the measure meets his full approval.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to ask one question, because I was not able to hear very distinctly the gentleman's explanation. Does this bill add to the collection district of which Chicago is the port of entry any other territory than that connected with the smelting works of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. HOPKINS. It extends the district so as to include within its limits the State of Illinois. This has been done at the suggestion of the Treasury Department, the officers of which thought that this change would be much better for the business of the Department than to attempt to carve out a small piece of territory within the immediate vicinity of the port of Chicago.

Mr. McMILLIN. The portion of territory referred to has been connected heretofore, as I understand, with the New Orleans district?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir. As the gentleman understands, under the law passed many years ago the collection district of New Orleans took in all the territory from that city clear up into Wisconsin; and when the port of Chicago was created its collection district was limited to the waters adjacent to Lake Michigan. Aurora is located some miles away on the Fox River, which empties into the Illinois River, and that into the Mississippi. Under existing circumstances these persons doing business at Aurora must stop their business unless they can have the privilege of paying their dues at Chicago, where their main office is.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman whether the passage of this bill is likely to necessitate the opening of new offices or to increase the number of officers?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. There will be no increase in the present number of officers.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. I wish to ask whether this bill includes southern Illinois?

Mr. HOPKINS. It takes in the State of Illinois, but it will not interfere with the port of delivery at Cairo.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. It does not interfere with the port of St. Louis?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, not at all. The only change would be that those ports of delivery would be in the new district, instead of the old one. They are not interfered with at all. That was a matter to which the Secretary called my attention specially; and the gentleman will see by the reading of the bill that those ports are to have the same powers and privileges that they have under existing law.

Mr. COBB of Missouri. The bill will not interfere in any respect with the existing ports?

Mr. HOPKINS. None whatever.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 803) was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

QUALIFICATION OF A MEMBER.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to call attention to the fact that Mr. Price, a member-elect from the State of Louisiana, is now present and would like to take the oath of office.

Mr. Andrew Price, a Representative-elect from the Third district of Louisiana, came forward and was duly qualified by taking the oath of office prescribed by law.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a combined statement of receipts and expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL WATER BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State, relating to an additional appropriation required by the International Water Boundary Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF DANIEL S. LOY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of an appropriation of $210 submitted by the Secretary of the Navy to pay Daniel S. Loy for three 11-inch shot manufactured for the use of the Navy in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARY LINE BETWEEN ALASKA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting an estimate of appropriation for survey of the boundary line between Alaska and British Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from Gen. W. B. Franklin, transmitting the annual report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KULP, for this day, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following requests for the withdrawal of papers:

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri, to take from the files of the House the pension papers in the case of Miss Annie Beach.

By Mr. BURRELL, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Mrs. Fannie Pemberton.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before consent is given to withdraw from the files of the House these papers, I wish to ask if there has been any adverse action taken by the committee upon them? I refer more particularly to the second request, the first one being, as I understand it, merely a pension claim.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the first case, Mr. Speaker, the request I have myself submitted, I understand that the report was favorable, but the bill was not acted upon during the session by the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. How with reference to the second case?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no knowledge with reference to that case.

Mr. DINGLEY. My inquiry was in order that we might have a rule in the beginning of this matter, so that where there is an adverse decision by the committee there should be left copies of the papers when withdrawn. If there has been no adverse decision, or if the report was favorable, there would be no objection, of course, to the withdrawal of papers without leaving copies.

I merely call the attention of the Chair to the matter at this time in order that the same rule may be applied in all such cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that these requests are only granted by unanimous consent, and if the gentleman from Maine objects, of course that ends the matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not object. I presume that there has been no adverse decision in either of these cases. My only object was to fix some rule, so that copies may be preserved of all papers where there has been an adverse adjudication on the part of the committees. It is only proper that some such measure of protection should be established on behalf of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The usual form, the Chair is advised, is to add to the request to withdraw papers the words "no adverse report has been made."

Is there objection to the request submitted?

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the second request go over until to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The second request is objected to. Is there objection to the other?

There was no objection?

SALARIES, ASSISTANTS IN DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration; and ask to make a brief explanation pending the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to present a resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk, and then asks permission to explain briefly the object of the resolution before unanimous consent is asked for its consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas under the provisions of section 60 of an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, the office of superintendent of the document room and two laborers in the document room under the Clerk of the House have been abolished, and the duties heretofore performed by them have devolved upon the superintendent of the document room, and his assistants under the Doorkeeper, who are unable to perform the additional duties imposed by said act; and

Whereas said sixtieth section of said act directs the Doorkeeper to appoint the necessary number of assistants to the superintendent of the document room; and

Whereas the Doorkeeper deems it necessary to appoint three additional assistants to properly perform the additional duties imposed under said act—one assistant at $1,600 per annum, one at $1,200 per annum, and one at $1,000 per annum, which salaries aggregate the same as those of the officers abolished by said act: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House, be and he hereby is, directed to pay the salaries of the said assistants to the superintendent of the document room, as above designated and appointed by the Doorkeeper, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, prior to the passage of the printing and binding bill of January 12, 1895, there were two document rooms, one under the Clerk of the House and one in the office of the Doorkeeper. The pay of one of the assistants in the office of the Clerk was $2,000 per annum, and there were two laborers or assistants, at $900 each, aggregating $3,800. The document room in the Doorkeeper's department consisted of the superintendent of documents and one assistant.

The bill known as the printing and binding bill, passed in the last Congress, abolished the document room in the office of the Clerk and placed the duties performed theretofore in that office upon the officials in charge of the document room in the Doorkeeper's office, and directed the Doorkeeper to appoint the necessary number of assistants to perform the duties of the office. This act went into effect on the 2d day of December, a week ago to-day.

Mr. DINGLEY. A year ago?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A week ago to-day, on the 2d of December, 1895; and of course the Doorkeeper of the last House did not appoint these assistants. Consequently the appropriation bill for this part of the fiscal year did not carry any appropriation for the payment of these assistants. Now, the fact is that all the work heretofore performed by both document rooms falls on two men in the Doorkeeper's department, the superintendent and one assistant, and they are utterly unable to perform the duties. The Doorkeeper deems it necessary to appoint three assistants, but there is no provision for their compensation, unless by resolution such as I have sent to the Clerk's desk. Of course you can refer this to the Committee on Accounts, and by virtue of the last legislative bill the Committee on Accounts holds over until a new Committee on Accounts is appointed—and that is probably the proper course to take—but it seems to me that the matter might as well be disposed of now, unless some one is not satisfied with the merits, importance, and necessity of the resolution. Of course I can not object if it is desired to refer the resolution to the Committee on Accounts, but it seems to me it is a matter that ought to pass on its merits.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to suggest that this question was considered by the subcommittee having in charge the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill at the last session. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], as I remember, paid some attention to it, as I myself did, in connection with other members of that subcommittee, and our purpose was to provide an ample force for the discharge of this public duty. We thought we had done so, and as I recall it, we gave the estimate of the last Doorkeeper. Now, I do not propose to object to anything that may be desired on the other side in the matter of providing a sufficient force for the conduct of the business of the House, but will suggest to the gentleman whether, at this early stage of the session, it would not be better to refer this proposition to a committee, the responsibility of course being on our friends across the aisle.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will ask the Clerk to read section 60 of the printing and binding bill, which will, perhaps, better explain the situation than I can myself. The force was provided for in that section, but it could not be brought about until now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 60. There shall be one document room of the Senate and one of the House of Representatives, to be designated, respectively, the "Senate and House document room." Each shall be in charge of a superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate and the Doorkeeper of the House, respectively, who shall also appoint the necessary number of assistants: Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the first day of the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You will observe that by this section the Doorkeeper is directed to appoint the necessary number of assistants. Now, of course he could not do that until this bill went into force. It did not go into force until last Monday, and unless additional assistants are appointed the whole of this work that has heretofore been performed by five men will fall upon two men. Undoubtedly, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] says, it was the intention to provide a sufficient force, but in the way that I have indicated, and in the way that I have suggested by this resolution. There is no other way.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, as I understand it, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill appropriates for the House force by name. Now, in every case where there is an appropriation there can be an official without further action by the House; but if I understand the gentleman aright, the printing bill that was passed under the leadership of the economical gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] in the last session of the last Congress makes it necessary to increase the force by the three officials referred to in the resolution, who are to be paid from the contingent fund. Now, I am not advised as to whether that is necessary or not, and while I have every confidence in the judgment and statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], I should be glad to have the views of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], under whose leadership this economical printing bill was passed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I have been named by the very distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I suppose it is necessary that I should say a word. The gentleman from Illinois assumes that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] has said that there has been an increase of three employees made necessary by reason of the economical bill to which he refers. Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] failed to state that that bill abolished the same number of employees as are included in this increase which is now asked. Therefore there is no real increase, and the gentleman must not assume, it seems to me, that the bill has made any increase in appropriations. Now, what I arise for, after mentioning that fact, is to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] if he deems it necessary to increase this force so far as messengers are concerned? The printing bill in the sixtieth section did abolish the Clerk's document room, and transferred whatever duties the superintendent had to the superintendent of the Doorkeeper's document room. Now, it may increase the clerical work of the Doorkeeper's document room, where this extra work is transferred, but I do not see how it increases his messengers.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This resolution does not increase the messengers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understood the resolution to call for an increase in the messengers.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It does not. Let that part of the resolution be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman can state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The document room in the Clerk's department consisted of a superintendent at $2,000 and two assistants at $900. The document room in the Doorkeeper's department consisted of a superintendent and one assistant only. This printing and binding bill abolished the Clerk's document room and abolished these three offices. This resolution asks to pay three assistants designated by the Doorkeeper as assistants to the superintendent of the document room in the Doorkeeper's department at the same salary that the other three had in the Clerk's department. That is all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The inquiry which I was propounding was whether the gentleman thought that the increase was necessary in the Doorkeeper's document room.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It occurred to me that there was so little work done in the Clerk's document room that it ought never to have been maintained.

Now, I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], or any gentleman who has had experience with the Clerk's document room, to tell us why it was ever necessary that there should be two document rooms, one under the Clerk and one under the Doorkeeper. I doubt whether members who have had ten years' experience here can tell what documents they have received from the Clerk's document room in contradistinction from those which they have received from the Doorkeeper's document room; and the gentlemen who framed that printing bill—three Senators and three Members of the House—thought that there should be one document room attached to the House, as there is to the Senate, and believing that, we recommended the abolition of the Clerk's document room and the transfer of the work to the Doorkeeper's document room in the interest of economy. I do not think it necessary to keep as many employees under the Doorkeeper as we had under him and the Clerk in the aggregate, but I do admit it to be necessary to make some increase in the Doorkeeper's force in the document room, and that is the object of my inquiry, to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks these additional assistants are necessary.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do; and I get that from conversation with the present Doorkeeper of the House, with the Doorkeeper of the last House, and with the superintendent, Mr. Hanna. He informs me that these three men are necessary, and that the present force can not possibly do the work without them.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course it is understood that the Clerk's document room was retained for the purpose of distributing documents which came especially to the Clerk, like the Journal. I do not know as to the other general documents sent to members, but my recollection is that the force in the Clerk's document room was reduced in the last legislative appropriation bill in accordance with the printing act somewhat. I appeal to the recollection of the chairman of the subcommittee in the last House.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true; and we gave, as I remember, the estimate of the Doorkeeper. The estimate was a reduction on account of the operation of the printing bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I remember the Clerk came before the committee and insisted that the reduction made was greater than it should be, but nevertheless the reduction was made.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You wiped it out altogether as to these men.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, what I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania is whether or no, if his resolution should be adopted, it would increase in the aggregate the House force as it was in the last Congress.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It would neither increase it a man nor a dollar, neither in numbers nor compensation. It is the same thing exactly.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will remember that the printing act transfers a part of the work to the Government Printing Office.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir. It also directs the Doorkeeper to name his assistants, and that is simply what I want to secure by this resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say, with the consent of the gentleman, speaking for myself only in the matter, that I can not consent to the increase of a single official in connection with the House unless there shall be shown to be a necessity for it which has not existed previously. My own judgment is that we have a very large force in connection with this House, and I will not agree to increase the number a single man unless some special necessity shall arise.

Now, if there is no increase of force proposed by this resolution, if it is simply a readjustment, without any increase, then, of course, I have no objection.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It is simply a readjustment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should, however, prefer to see this resolution go to the Committee on Accounts, in order that the matter might be properly examined and our force adjusted so that we should be certain that there would be no increase, and possibly that there would be some reduction.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Even if there were some increase I should not object; but in the meantime here are only two men to handle all these documents, and they say that they can not do it. There were five employees for this purpose in the last House, while now there are only two. This resolution simply fixes the compensation of three assistants that the Doorkeeper desires to appoint.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has not a part of that work been transferred to the Government Printing Office, so that now there is not so much work to be done by these employees as there was before the passage of the printing bill?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir; there is just as much work as there was before.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that no transfer of any part of the work was made by the bill.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The printing bill contemplates this action being taken, because it says, "who shall appoint the necessary number of assistants." The bill assumed that there was not a sufficient force in the document department of the Doorkeeper's office.

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I accept the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], that there is no increase of force proposed by this resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I have already said, there is not the increase of a man or a dollar.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, while I am not going to object if, as I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say, there is no increase here proposed, still I do understand that the abolition of force in the Clerk's document room made by the printing act, which was to result in a great saving, amounts to nothing, and that after that act has gone into effect this resolution is found to be necessary, which proposes to provide for precisely the same number of employees that existed there prior to the abolition.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is correct.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to withdraw the statement which he made in his opening remarks, that this resolution would increase expenses. He now concedes, as I understand, that there is no increase.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know. I have been trying to find that out from my economical friend from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I simply wished to know whether the gentleman did not accept the assurance of his distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], that the resolution would make no increase.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, yes; and I also accept the assurance of my distinguished colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that it makes no increase.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this matter, the reduction of expenses which was made by the economical printing measure passed by a Democratic House last year is now about to be nullified by this Republican House, at the beginning of this Congress. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

HOUSE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That from and after this date, under direction of the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, Isaac R. Hill be authorized to act as an assistant doorkeeper, at a compensation at the rate of $1,500 per annum; that Thomas A. Coakley and George L. Browning be authorized to act as special messengers of the House of Representatives at a compensation at the rate of $1,200 per annum each; and that James F. English be authorized to act as a chief page of the House of Representatives at a compensation at the rate of $900 per annum; the said compensation of said employees to be paid from the contingent fund until otherwise provided.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I will state to the House that this resolution provides for the same amount of force that was allowed to the minority in the last Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is correct.

Mr. SAYERS. I will add that the intimation was made to the minority in the present House that if they would select their men the majority would accept them and provide for their compensation out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the gentleman from Texas whether these are the names that have been agreed upon by the Democratic caucus?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the proposed compensation the same as before?

Mr. SAYERS. Just the same, I am informed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that in the last House the designation was "special employee," while in this resolution it is "assistant doorkeeper." Does that carry any increase of compensation?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. My understanding is that Mr. Hill received $1,500 in the last Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the change is only in the designation, not in the compensation.

Mr. SAYERS. Not in the compensation. I understand, also, that the compensation was the same in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this resolution is offered in pursuance of a custom which has prevailed for many years, of allowing the minority a certain number of employees.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I would like to know why the designation is changed to "assistant doorkeeper?"

Mr. SAYERS. Because this gentleman has always performed the duties of that position. By this resolution we are but specifying in this Congress the places which were actually filled by the minority in the Fifty-second Congress, and also by the minority in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. PAYNE. Was the same designation used in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. SAYERS. I so understand.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas adopt the same designation which was used in the resolution adopted by the last House, "special employee," instead of assistant doorkeeper.

Mr. SAYERS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I wish to ask a question. Is it understood that Mr. Coakley is to be one of these special employees?

Mr. SAYERS. It is.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is not Mr. Coakley now upon the annual roll under regular appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. But my understanding is that he will take his place under this resolution, instead of continuing to hold upon the annual roll. We supposed, of course, that the majority would displace Mr. Coakley as an employee on the annual roll and put one of their own men in that position.

Several MEMBERS. Very likely! [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. As I understand, this is an increase——

Mr. SAYERS. No; this is just the same number of officers that were allowed the minority in the last Congress.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I have here the resolution of the last Congress, allowing officers to the minority. It names George Jenison, $1,200; E. L. Currier, $1,200, and Bert Kennedy, $900.

Mr. SAYERS. Then Mr. Chancey, as the gentleman will remember, was put on at $1,500.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But John Chancey has been appropriated for regularly——

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly, but for the benefit of the minority.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. For the last twenty years. He is now on the regular roll.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly, and always at the request of the minority.

I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I believe it was the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] who approached me and said that four places would be allowed the minority, as had been done in the last Congress; and he also assured me that if the minority would select the persons to fill those places, the majority would approve them.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think I did say that, after talking with some of our "watch dogs of the Treasury" on this side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I concede the propriety of allowing certain special employees who will be in harmony with the minority. That courtesy has ordinarily been extended; and I do not wish it to be understood that I am now going to object to it. But I do say that the men who are now being paid from the contingent fund under the resolution of the last Congress, which recognized these designations by the minority, are three: Jenison, $1,200; Currier, $1,200; Kennedy, $900.

Mr. SAYERS. No man knows better than the gentleman from Illinois that Mr. Chancey was provided for by the majority in the Fifty-second Congress at the special request of the minority.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not raising any question about that just at this time. I may speak of that later on. I am not antagonizing the gentleman's proposition; but I want the matter understood.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to modify my resolution by inserting after the words "twelve hundred dollars" the word "each," so as to read "$1,200 each."

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the gentleman's resolution in its present form uses the designation "special employees."

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman not to offer his proposition as an amendment to this resolution. If we are going to do a graceful thing toward the minority, let us do it; and then let the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] come up afterwards.

Mr. TAWNEY. My proposition would not change the terms of the resolution of the gentleman from Texas, but would simply add an amendment. But I withhold it for the present.

Mr. STALLINGS. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] has the right to submit his proposition.

The resolution of Mr. STALLINGS was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry H. Moler be authorized to act as a second assistant doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, and to receive the same pay as the present assistant doorkeeper until further orders.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is offered, as the Chair understands, as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. DINGLEY. Does this give an additional officer to the minority?

Mr. SAYERS. This was not asked for by the minority in their caucus.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then let us vote it down; that will end the matter quickly.

The question being taken, the proposed amendment of Mr. STALLINGS was rejected.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. SAYERS as modified, it was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. TAWNEY. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John T. Chancey be, and he is hereby, retained on the roll of the House, in his present position as special employee, at the salary now provided by law.

That Lauritz Olson be, and he is hereby, appointed special employee of the House at a salary of $1,500 per annum, and that E. L. Currier and Arthur Buchanan be, and they are hereby, appointed special employees of the House, at a salary of $1,200 per annum each.

That the salaries of said special employees shall be paid monthly, out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise ordered.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Does this resolution take from the Doorkeeper of the House the power to appoint or to remove Mr. Chancey?

Mr. TAWNEY. No, it does not. I will say, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois, the resolution does not affect the present status of Mr. Chancey in the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then why include him in the resolution at all?

Mr. TAWNEY. Simply because the Doorkeeper has no power to appoint him. He has been appointed by the House exclusively for many years in this manner, and in order to retain his services the House must make the appointment in this way.

A MEMBER. Is he not on the roll now?

Mr. TAWNEY. He is not on the Doorkeeper's roll, nor on any other roll.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be again reported. We were unable in the confusion to hear it read here.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, Mr. Speaker, my inquiry addressed to the gentleman from Minnesota was this: The resolution provides that these special employees shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. I asked the gentleman from Minnesota about Mr. Chancey, if he was not now on the regular roll, filling a place appropriated for in the legislative bill of the last Congress. The gentleman replied that he was not. I have no doubt the gentleman was entirely honest in the reply, but he is not informed. I have looked up the matter somewhat carefully, and Mr. Chancey is now on the annual roll at a salary of $1,500 per annum.

If this resolution is adopted it pays him from the contingent fund and leaves the place he now occupies, and already appropriated for, open for the appointment of some other employee. Aye, more, I might add that that is the same case with Mr. Coakley; but that has already been passed upon by the House, and I simply want to call the attention of the members present to the fact that we have not only been courteous by putting him on the contingent fund at the request of our friends on the other side of the House, but have made another place to be filled by the Doorkeeper. That is all. I am perfectly willing that the House may do as it chooses, but I simply wanted it to understand what it was doing when it did it. We are increasing these places, that is all.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that the resolution does not provide for the payment of Mr. Chancey's salary.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe, Mr. Speaker, this is proceeding by unanimous consent. There has been no leave to consider it, as I understand it, given by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands not.

Mr. TAWNEY. This resolution does not provide for the payment of Mr. Chancey's salary from the contingent fund of the House, but it does provide that it shall be paid as already fixed by the existing law. I understand an appropriation was made during the last session of Congress for this salary; but his retention in the present position depends on this House and not on the last one, because he was appointed by the House and not by any officer of the House, and that is the reason why at every Congress he has secured the passage of a similar resolution retaining him in the position that he occupies at the salary provided for by law. I may say that Mr. Currier has also been on the roll in the same way, and also Mr. Olson.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. If I remember, it has been the custom of the two sides of the House, as the majority happened to change one way or the other, to extend this courtesy to each other. Whenever one side was in power it has been customary to allow the other side to have a sufficient number of employees on the roll to look after the Hall during caucuses and to attend to the wants of the members. I believe Mr. Chancey has been in the employ of the House ever since I have been here, by some such arrangement as that. But about these other gentlemen—why may not this other question go over until the force is regularly provided for in the organization of the House?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Currier, I understand, is in the same position in that regard as Mr. Chancey; that is to say, he has been a special employee of the House, and his further services in the House now can be continued only by consent of the House appointing him in some such manner as this.

Mr. McMILLIN. But could not these employees be retained in the regular way, without a special resolution introduced before the organization of the House is completed? It seems to me that we might proceed more systematically by deferring this matter to some period after the organization of the House has been completed. Because, as indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it seems we are about to get into the position of having one man appointed by two authorities and allowed a salary of $1,500 by each one.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen whose names appear in this resolution were selected by the Republicans at their caucus before the organization of the House, and the resolution is presented in accordance with the direction of that caucus.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not propose to object, but I want to call attention to the effect of the resolution, which is simply to increase the force to the extent of four persons.

Mr. TAWNEY. No, I beg the gentleman's pardon; it does not have that effect.

Mr. DOCKERY. In other words, these were the employees provided by the last Democratic House and given to the minority. You have just adopted the resolution of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], which provides for the minority representation in addition to the regular force. The action proposed, therefore, in reference to Mr. Chancey, who is now on the roll and carried in the regular annual appropriation bill—as also the three employees who were carried in the last House by resolution—will result, as I understand it, in an increase of the force by four persons.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. DOCKERY. If that is desired by the other side I shall not object, but I suggest that these matters should go to a committee.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE].

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. As I understand it, Mr. Chancey has been so long a fixture in the House that he is not properly chargeable to either side. I do not think he has any politics. He is a sort of general fixture. Gentlemen on both sides of the House concede that; so that he ought not to be charged to us especially, and I do not think our friends on the other side ought to put us in that position. As to this Mr. Olson, he is a man who had both arms shot off. You have all seen him about the building here. He has been on the special roll for years. As to Mr. Currier, he has been so seriously wounded that he is helpless and crippled. The fourth man, young Mr. Buchanan, is probably the only one against whom any objection could be had, and if our friends are afraid that his recognition as a special employee will increase expenditures too much, why, drop him off and we will find a place for him somewhere else; but I think he might as well stay.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, I know there is a good deal of pressure and this will somewhat relieve the situation. [Laughter.] There is no question about that; but the responsibility, of course, is with the other side.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, we are loading up with helpless, crippled people. We can not help it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I see you are badly crippled. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Question!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better to have this go to the Committee on Accounts. I should like to know whether we are increasing the number of employees.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the matter is referred to the Committee on Accounts.

PRESENTATION OF A MEMORIAL.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial from the National Wool Growers' Association of the United States and others, asking the passage of an act providing for protective duties on wool, and for other purposes. I ask that the same may be printed, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means when appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio desires to present a memorial of the National Wool Growers' Association, and asks unanimous consent that it be printed.

Mr. DANFORD. And referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I could not hear the gentleman's statement. What is his request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] presents a memorial of the National Wool Growers' Association, and asks that the same be printed and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The rules provide that that shall be printed as a document, if it is presented.

Mr. DANFORD. That is all I desire. I do not ask to have it printed in the RECORD, but simply printed as a document.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was informed that the gentleman's request was that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DANFORD. Oh, no; simply to be printed as a document in the usual course.

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the gentleman propose to have simply the memorial printed, or the accompanying bundle of papers which we see in front of us?

Mr. DANFORD. Just the memorial, and the papers accompanying it.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is a pretty voluminous document, it seems to me, to go into the RECORD.

Mr. DANFORD. I do not ask that it go into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It is subject to the objection of any member of the House.

Mr. CRISP. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] objects.

Mr. DANFORD. It is not my purpose to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. DANFORD. Then I withdraw the memorial.

GRANTED LANDS.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reading of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and thereupon I shall ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah presents a resolution and asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution, requesting the Secretary of the Interior to transmit information to the House relating to granted lands, was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects.

CASE OF EX-CONSUL WALLER.

Mr. WOODMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents a resolution and asks for its consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The resolution, requesting the Secretary of State to communicate to Congress the correspondence bearing on the trial, conviction, and incarceration of Mr. John L. Waller, formerly consul of the United States at Tamatave, Madagascar, was read.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think that resolution should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I object to its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

PENSIONERS DROPPED FROM THE ROLLS.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent to consider it at this time.

The resolution, calling on the Commissioner of Pensions to report on all pensioners who have ceased to draw pensions in whole or in part during the last three years, was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask for a rereading of the first section of the resolution. I wish to learn whom it calls upon for this information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Commissioner of the Pension Office——

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is not usual to call upon the heads of bureaus for information, but on the heads of Departments. I think this resolution ought to go to some committee in order that it may be reported in proper form to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I presume the gentleman will modify his resolution by substituting the Secretary of the Interior for the Commissioner of Pensions, if that is the only objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it ought to go to the committee and be reported upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

Mr. CRISP. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTS OF BOARD OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, when the reports of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes were submitted to the House this morning I was not aware that it was done. The law, I believe, provides that 1,600 copies of each report be printed. It has been found that 500 copies of each report will be sufficient. I therefore ask that the order be made for 500 copies of each report and that the usual number of bound copies be furnished for the use of the officers of the Homes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the law provides for the number of copies. If any change be made as to the number of copies, it will have to be made in the law, and consequently a joint resolution would have to be introduced.

Mr. STEELE. Then we have got to print 1,600 copies whether we need them or not, that is all. Then I ask unanimous consent that the usual number of copies be bound for the use of the officers of the Homes, for both the State and the National Homes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will please put his resolution in writing.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Indiana if the general printing law does not provide for binding these books?

Mr. STEELE. I do not know. Does the gentleman from Tennessee know?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman to let it go over until to-morrow, that he ascertain the facts.

Mr. PAYNE. Is this the economical law that we have heard so much about?

Mr. STEELE. I will ask that the matter go over until to-morrow, until I can ascertain exactly what number is necessary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that will be done.

Mr. CRISP. I demand the regular order. I understand the gentleman has withdrawn his proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the legislature of Minnesota, praying that the buildings and grounds on which old Fort Snelling is situated be granted to that State in perpetuity for use as a museum for military and other purposes; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

Resolved by the legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, requested to grant to the State of Minnesota, in perpetuity, the old buildings and the ground upon which they stand, which constitute the old and original Fort Snelling in the State of Minnesota, to be forever used by said State, perpetually, as a museum of natural, military, civil, botanical, and archæological history of this State.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to urge this measure upon the attention of the Congress of the United States.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to forward copies of these resolutions to the Vice-President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 2, 1895.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Department of State:

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of house file No. 99, filed in this office March 2, 1895.

ALBERT BERG, Secretary of State.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the legislature of Minnesota, praying for the passage of the Olney arbitration bill or some ther scheme of arbitration between the railroad companies of the United States and their employees; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas the past year has been characterized by disastrous railroad strikes, bringing untold losses to the business interests of the land and great suffering and losses to the employees upon the railroads, and

Whereas the country will continue to be liable to a recurrence of such losses and suffering so long as the nation is unprovided with some suitable method of settling controversies between the railroad companies of the land and their employees: Therefore be it

Resolved by the legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Congress of the United States be, and the same are, respectfully requested by this memorial to enact into a law the arbitration bill now before Congress and known as the Olney arbitration bill, or enact some other suitable and comprehensible law for the legal and prompt settlement of all controversies between the railroads of the country and their employees.

The secretary of state is hereby requested to forward copies of this memorial and resolution to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved March 2, 1895.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Department of State:

I hereby certify that this is a true and correct copy of house file No. 460, filed in this office March 2, 1895.

ALBERT BERG, Secretary of State.

Mr. CALL presented a petition, in the form of resolutions, adopted at a mass meeting called by the mayor of the city of West Tampa, Fla.; a petition of Nassau Camp, No. 104, Union Confederate Veterans, of Fernandina, Fla., and a petition of the city council of St. Augustine, Fla., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of the National Wool Growers' Association and others, with accompanying papers, praying for protective legislation for the sheep industry. As it is the petition of an association of great national importance, I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Francis A. Field, late captain, Eleventh United States Infantry, praying for the enactment of legislation restoring him to the Army and placing him on the retired list thereof; which was referred to the Commttee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of six clubs composed of colored men in Massachusetts, signed by their officers, all of the highest respectability, stating that in some parts of the country daily the lives of American citizens are taken, some burned alive, under circumstances of the grossest cruelty, without any trial by jury or other legal process. The petitioners desire, if there is not now power in Congress to suppress these crimes, that the Constitution may be amended so that proper laws may be made. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, to whom was referred the bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during the sessions of Congress, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 242) to require payment of pension money to wives in cases where male pensioners desert or abandon their families, or are habitual drunkards, or for any reason fail and neglect to support their families, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 480) granting a pension to William B. Matchett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 682) for the relief of the heirs of Sterling T. Austin, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PALMER introduced a bill (S. 683) granting restoration of pension to Wallace G. Bone; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 684) granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 685) granting a pension to Mrs. Alice Martin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLS introduced a bill (S. 686) to increase the pension of Francis M. Durham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PRITCHARD (by request) introduced a bill (S. 688) for the relief of Thomas S. Lutterloh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 689) to equalize the several States of the Union in the grant of lands for school purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 690) for the relief of Fanny B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BATE introduced a bill (S. 691) for the relief of Capt. W. M. Wallace; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 692) for the relief of the legal representatives of James and William Crooks, of Canada; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 693) granting a pension to Joseph U. H. Gill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 694) for the relief of James R. D. Morrison and William H. Morrison, executor of William M. Morrison and administrator of Charles J. Morrison, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 695) granting an increase of pension to Richard Dobson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 696) granting a pension to Nancy J. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 697) for the reconstruction of the United States custom-house and post-office building at St. Albans, Vt., destroyed by fire May 19, 1895; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 698) to provide for the erection of an additional fireproof building for the National Museum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduce, by request, a bill of which I do not approve. I ask that it be read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (S. 699) to aid in regulating the currency was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 700) for the relief of John E. Welch; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 701) for the relief of Charles A. M. Mead; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 702) granting a pension to Caroline Stockton Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 703) for the relief of the widow of George C. Foulk, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 704) for the relief of George Rushburger; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 705) granting a pension to Emily B. Muncey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 706) for the relief of Eugenia Wood; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 707) to increase the pension of Brig. Gen. Charles A. Heckman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McBRIDE introduced a bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads, and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 709) for the relief of W. L. Adams, of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Lieut. Frederick Schwatka; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 711) to provide for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oreg.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 712) to pay the claims of citizens of Oregon for supplies audited by Philo Callender, commissioner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 713) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 714) granting a pension to Benjamin Franklin Dowell, of Oregon, for services with the Oregon Volunteers in the years 1853, 1854, 1855, and 1856; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 715) for the relief of B. F. Dowell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 716) to correct the naval history of John C. Dull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 717) for the erection of a public building at Fergus Falls, Minn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 718) subjecting national banks to the usury laws of the States where they are located; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 719) to restore a pension to Harriet M. Knowlton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 720) for the relief of settlers on second indemnity lands of the Northern Pacific Railway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAULKNER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 721) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 722) for the relief of Mrs. Rhoda Neal; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 723) for the relief of William M. Coffman, administrator of Samuel Coffman, deceased, late of Greenbrier County, W. Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 724) granting an increase of pension to Helen M. Mallery; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 725) granting a pension to Anna C. Garber; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 726) granting an increase of pension to Henry Slaughter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 727) granting increase of pensions to soldiers who have lost an eye; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 728) to compensate Elihu Root for services rendered by direction of the Attorney-General; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 729) for the relief of the heirs of Henry Herrman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 731) in amendment of an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 732) to regulate the issue and recording of the commissions of officers in several of the Departments; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 733) for the relief of the heirs of S. H. Hill, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 734) for ascertaining the feasibility and probable cost of constructing a canal from the Tennessee River, at or near the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, to the navigable waters of the Savannah River, in the State of Georgia, by which there will be furnished adequate water communication by the shortest and most practicable route between the Atlantic Ocean and the navigable waters of the rivers in the Mississippi Valley; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the bill may lie on the table, in order that at some future time I may submit some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a bill (S. 736) for the relief of the heirs of Myra Clark Gaines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. SQUIRE introduced a bill (S. 735) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy; to increase the usefulness and numbers of the Corps of Naval Engineers; to induce the scientific institutions to provide a naval engineering reserve for time of war; to establish a naval engineering experimental station, and to encourage the study of the mechanic arts and sciences, and particularly that of naval engineering in the technological colleges of the country; which was read twice by its title.

INCREASE OF NAVAL ENGINEERING EFFICIENCY.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to the bill by way of explanation. It provides first for an increase in the number of the Corps of Naval Engineers. On this point we have the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted April 20, 1892, in which they call attention to the fact that the Corps of Naval Engineers then consisted of 189 persons in all, and in the opinion of the committee at that time there were required 303 officers for the Bureau of Engineering. The committee in their report state as follows:

> It will be seen that the total number for supplying effectively the demands of the Navy for sea and shore duty is 303, an increase of 114 over the present list, as stated above.
> In view of the increase in the number of war ships, completed and provided for with modern, complicated machinery, propelled almost entirely by steam power, your committee is of opinion that this number added to the Engineer Corps of the Navy is not only not excessive, but necessary to meet the requirements of the service.

In the same report I notice a paragraph from the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, as follows:

> There is still another and very important point that is generally overlooked when considering the Engineer Corps of the Navy, and that is that it is a part of the military organization and second to none in importance. In the naval battle of the future the engineer staff will have a difficult and important part to perform, and if there is failure in the engine room no amount of skill and bravery on the bridge may suffice to avert disaster. Celerity of movement has decided many a naval battle and will decide many more, and the celerity of movement of a modern ship depends directly on the skill of her engineer officers.

There are three or four other points to which I wish to refer briefly. The bill proposes to give positive rank and title to the officers of the Corps of Engineers, or the Bureau of Engineering, as it is termed in the bill. The third point is that the command of the engineer force shall be under the authority of the commanding officer of the ship. Fourth, the manner of selecting cadets and filling vacancies in the Engineer Corps should be changed. This is the educational feature of the bill. Fifth, the enlargement of the duties of the Engineer Corps of the Navy in accordance with modern requirements is provided for in the bill.

Mr. President, by the courtesy of Rear-Admiral Beardslee, commanding the United States naval forces on the Pacific coast, I recently visited the flagship Philadelphia, and had great satisfaction in examining that splendid cruiser. Going through the vessel below the water line, I observed the vast amount of machinery, the complicated elements that enter into its construction, making the care of a modern vessel of war very important as regards the feature of steam engineering. One passes through compartment after compartment, and is almost lost in bewilderment in the mazes of the complicated machinery around him. It occurred to me that not enough attention has been paid to the personnel of the Navy as respects steam engineering. Truly, the propelling power is the soul of the ship. Without it the ship can not be handled and is totally useless. This power is under the supervision of the engineer officers. Therefore it is needful to have a high order of personnel, a larger number of officers, and those of great attainments and proficiency.

If I am correctly informed, steam power as applied to the propulsion of ships of the Navy has originated so recently as since the year 1845. At first it was so little used that the smokestack was telescoped up in sections for occasional use. This fact will indicate its then comparative unimportance. Since those days steam power has gradually gained in importance until it has become the sole propelling power, and sails are now entirely discarded in the "new Navy.' This fact was distinctly recognized in the British navy when Capt. (now Rear-Admiral, retired) P. H. Colomb, royal navy, said:

What we have to do in the navy is really to welcome the coming, speed the parting guest. The parting guest is the seamanship of the past, that which confined itself to the management of the ship under sail alone. The coming guest is steam, mechanism, and forces of all kinds other than the winds. Now, instead of frankly going out, shaking hands, and bidding good-bye to the parting guest, and wishing him well, and going down to the steps to meet the new one and bring him in, we are holding on to the coat tails of the old one, and trying to shake hands with the coming guest with the left hand, or perhaps with only one finger.

In 1891, Assistant Secretary Soley, of the Navy, said to the graduating class at the United States Naval Academy:

To-day the steel ship, carrying thirty or forty separate engines, cut up into innumerable compartments, lighted by electricity and as fine and complicated in its interior details as the works of a watch, requires for its management a far more advanced training.

What was true a few years ago is still more impressive to-day, when we have one great battle ship in commission, another nearly completed, other battle ships in process of construction, besides several torpedo boats of the highest type now contracted for, and twelve others of the latter class included in the estimates of the Department for the next fiscal year.

In order to provide additional engineer officers, many years ago—I think it was in the year 1879—there was a provision of law enacted authorizing the President to appoint 25 of the officers of this Bureau to give instruction in engineering and marine architecture in the colleges and schools of the land. The State University of Washington has recently made application for such an officer, and I learn that the request has been up to the present time refused or not acted upon, on the ground that there are not enough officers to enable a sufficient number to be detailed for such duty, and that there is actually only one such officer now so employed in the United States. There is no doubt of the fact that the great engineering schools of our principal universities, such as Yale, Harvard, Cornell, and many others that I might mention, have been increased in usefulness by reason of the detail of officers of the Engineer Corps of the Navy.

We are building in this country vessels that were unknown to former times, and we need adepts in the art of engineering and marine architecture. There is no way to obtain a suitable class of men except by preparing them in the various educational schools. Ships can be built, but men can not be built. When war comes, if it should come, unhappily, we will need proper men to handle these great engines of war. The only way to have such men is to educate them in advance. I believe the provisions of the law of 1879 should be carried out, and that the schools and colleges of the land which apply for professors of steam engineering and naval architecture should be accommodated by the detail of officers for such purpose. But that is only one of the features which contribute to the practical merit of this measure.

It is evident, too, that there is great danger of the breaking down of those officers. They are employed in very difficult work. To take care of all this valuable property requires a high degree of skill, and causes an immense strain upon the officers. It is well known that our battle ships cost about $4,000,000 apiece, and they are liable to have something out of order all the time. In fact, one of the officers of this corps told me that there is usually something out of order on a war vessel all the time requiring the attention of an expert. Oftentimes those officers have to submit to very severe physical strains. They have to go down and work in the hold of the ship, where the temperature ranges from 150° to 170° Fahrenheit, and this causes great physical exhaustion. I believe that the number of engineer officers should be increased so as to make provision for these breakdowns, and to enable a sufficient number of officers to be employed on vessels to allow for necessary changes in the supervisory watch.

I am not undertaking to present this matter in full to-day. I wish merely to say enough to call the attention of the Senate to the subject. I believe that this branch of the service of the Navy should be encouraged and dignified and rendered more attractive and popular to the cadets and those naturally fitted to become engineers, and for this and other reasons that the officers should be given positive rank and title, so that a mere officer of the deck, perhaps an ensign, can not control a commodore in the Bureau of Engineering unless such officer shall be in command of the ship. I think, too, that the manner of selecting cadets and filling vacancies in the Engineer Corps should be changed so that Senators shall have the appointment of such cadets. Something must be done or the personnel of the engineering force in the Navy will fall far below the proper standard. In fact, it may be considered relatively below it to-day, as shown by the report of the Naval Committee in 1892. We have in commission in the Navy at this time 42 vessels, with 19 more vessels building, making in all 61. It is useless to undertake to manage this vast interest without having competent men, men thoroughly educated and prepared, and a sufficient number of them to provide for the necessary changes. This branch of the service, as I have stated, should be popularized in every suitable way.

Then, again, I believe that some of the duties of the officers of this Department should be changed. For example, I think that the purchases of coal to be tested for use on our war vessels should be made through the Bureau of Engineering and not through the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. The engineers know, or can ascertain, what should be tried in the way of coal, and what kinds of coal are best adapted to the service. On the Pacific Coast we have had occasion to criticise severely the fact that our American vessels of war have not been using the coal of the United States, but have been going to British Columbia for their coal, very much to the disgust of our own American people on that coast. We believe that suitable appliances should be prepared for using American coal. If there is any trouble on account of what is called the forced draft or the too free burning of the coal, then appliances should be arranged and regulated to use American coal, so that when vessels find themselves engaged at some time possibly in the future with a foreign foe they can obtain their coals in the United States, and those coals will be suitable to use in their furnaces. Why should we wait the advent of war before we adapt our war ships to the supplies obtainable in time of war? Therefore I think this question is one of vital importance. I want to see not only the question of experimental tests, but the whole question of coal purchases referred to the Bureau of Engineering. If necessary, this Bureau can adapt their furnaces and appliances to suit the coal to be obtained on any part of our extensive coasts. But I have no doubt that much depends upon proper tact and management in the use of coals in the fast-burning furnaces. The whole responsibility for this should be thrown upon the Bureau of Engineers, where it properly belongs.

How ridiculous for our Navy to depend upon foreign coal when there are vast supplies of American coal within easy reach, suitable for steam purposes, as proved by long use and experience!

Then, too, Mr. President, we have all the electrical appliances to be cared for. The officers of the Bureau of Steam Engineering now have the work of caring for those appliances, putting them in repair; and I believe the whole subject of electrical apparatus should come under the Bureau of Engineering, reorganized as proposed in this bill. In fact, the subject is one that should engage the very early attention of the Senate.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and trust we may receive a favorable and prompt report.

The motion was agreed to.

INTRUDERS IN CHEROKEE COUNTRY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the removal of intruders from the Cherokee country until the further action of Congress; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to suspend action under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893 (27 Stats., 641), ratifying the agreement with the Cherokee Nation of December 19, 1891, as to the actual removal from the Cherokee country of persons designated by the authorities as intruders until the appraisal of the value of the improvements of such persons shall have been completed and submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior and until the further action of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Arkansas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Has the joint resolution had the approbation, informally, of the members of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It has been informally submitted to all the members of the committee who are present, so far as I know, and it meets the approval of all so far as I am informed.

Mr. GRAY. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will give us a brief explanation of the object of the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In the last Indian appropriation act there was a provision almost identical with the terms of the joint resolution. At the end of the provision a proviso was inserted, which I shall read, but I will read the whole paragraph:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to suspend action under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, (27 Stats., 641), ratifying the agreement with the Cherokee Nation of December 19, 1891, as to the actual removal from the Cherokee country of persons designated by the authorities as intruders until the appraisal of the value of the improvements of such persons shall have been completed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and submitted by him to Congress, and the removal of such intruders shall not be made earlier than January 1, 1896: Provided, That whenever any intruder shall have been paid or tendered the appraised value of his improvements, if he does not immediately surrender possession of the same to the authorities of the Cherokee Nation he shall pay rent therefor at the rate usual in the country, but this provision shall not be construed to extend the time for the removal of intruders according to the foregoing agreement beyond the 1st day of January, 1896.

Under this provision it seems to be absolutely necessary that the Secretary of the Interior shall remove these people from the Cherokee country between now and the 1st day of January, 1896. Congress appointed a commission during its last session, generally known as the Dawes Commission, which was sent among those people, and was empowered to arrange with them for a settlement of the questions that are pending. The Commission recommends certain action by Congress. I have the report of the Commission before me, and it is very clear and distinct in its recommendations.

This joint resolution simply provides for the maintenance of the condition of things existing now as to the people called intruders until Congress shall take whatever action it chooses to take under the recommendation of the Dawes Commission. There are several thousand people who are claimed by the Cherokees to be intruders, who claim on their part that they are citizens under the laws of the country, and the object is simply to prevent any action from being taken for the present until these questions are settled under the law that is to be passed by Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the joint resolution read again.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLATT. I introduce a joint resolution for reference eventually to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I desire that it shall be printed and lie on the table, as some Senators have suggested to me that they would like to make some remarks upon it before its reference, and perhaps I myself may desire to do so.

The joint resolution (S. R. 20) concerning the condition of the Indian Territory as regards population, occupation of land, etc., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the condition of the Indian Territory as regards population, occupation of land, and the absence of adequate government for the security of life and property has so changed since the making of treaties with the Five Civilized Tribes that the United States is no longer under either legal or moral obligation to guarantee or permit tribal Indian government in said Territory, and should at once take such steps as may be necessary to protect the rights and liberties of all the inhabitants of said territories.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will lie on the table.

STATUE OF GENERAL SHIELDS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in one volume the proceedings in Congress upon the acceptance of the statue of James Shields, 16,500 copies, of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 each for use and distribution by the governors of Illinois, Minnesota, and Missouri, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed an engraving of said statue to accompany said proceedings, said engraving to be paid for out of the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the resolution necessarily goes to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the rule it must be so referred.

Mr. HARRIS. I rose for the purpose of asking the Senator if it must not under the law go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. I so understand it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CALL submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That humanity and religion and the principles on which all civilization rests demand that the civilized Governments shall by peaceful negotiations, or if necessary by force of arms, prevent and suppress the cruelties and massacres inflicted on the Armenian subjects of Turkey by the establishment of a government of their own people, with such guaranties by the civilized powers of its authority and permanence as shall be adequate to that end.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution may lie on the table for the present, and that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes, relative to ports of entry, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the bill may lie on the table for the present, so that I may call it up later and have it considered.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the joint resolution (S. R. 12) to enforce the Monroe doctrine, which I introduced some days ago, and which was laid on the table, may now be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Illinois, which will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the policy proclaimed by President Monroe in his message of December 2, 1823, and since known as the Monroe doctrine, is by precedent and tradition the recognized rightful policy of the United States, and that this Government will regard the establishment by any European power of any new colonial dependency, or of any protectorate over any existing or future government, or the extension of any territorial possession, or the control or ownership of any interoceanic canal on the continent of America as a dangerous menace to the welfare and prosperity of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. After I shall have made the remarks which I propose to submit on the joint resolution, unless some other Senator desires to address himself to the subject, I shall ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. President, the United States is not a government of conquest or of usurpation. Our country is not a country of wars and warfare. Our people are not bred to the business of human slaughter, nor educated in the trade of blood. Our fathers taught us that the empire of happiness was not to be reached by grasping the territory of our neighbors, but rather that the peace and prosperity of our country and the highest enjoyment of our people would be found in wisely caring for the magnificent inheritance which they transmitted to us. The title deeds to this vast estate came to us hallowed by the immortal farewell of Washington, and by the utterances of Jefferson and Madison, Adams and Monroe.

We find ourselves in possession of a land the greatest and best upon the earth; a dominion of which King Solomon in all his glory never dreamed. Those of us who are "native and to the manner born" love our country and our institutions with unbounded devotion; while our brothers from other lands who have joined in citizenship with us here emulate the best of us in patriotism and Americanism.

To what purpose have we reached this high degree in the progress of nations? Shall we see to it that our future shall advance as our past has done; that we take no step backward, but still keep up the march of the Republic?

If we would do this in this world of competition and strife, and maintain our national honor, with our territorial unity and integrity, we must have some affirmative, distinctive idea or policy of such simple and unquestioned propriety that it shall receive the universal sanction of our people. It must possess such elements of right and justice in itself and bear such interpretation in the relation it shall declare between the United States and other nations that no serious objection can lie against it. By the adoption of such a policy, and its public declaration by the Congress of the United States, we ennoble what we all substantially approve as the Monroe doctrine, and it becomes at once and forever thereafter the American doctrine. It becomes, indeed, the utterance of the American people, as supreme and sacred in its authority as that other declaration, headed by John Hancock, which in 1776, in the name and by the authority of the good people of the colonies, solemnly published and declared "that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States."

Mr. President, in my judgment, in view of the history of the past, in view of the position which the United States maintains among the nations of the earth, and in close view of the current events which bear upon our welfare and upon the peace of the world, we can not longer delay the proclamation of the American policy, long known as the Monroe doctrine, without trifling with the interests which are committed to our charge. This much is due to ourselves, that by no laches on our part can it be truly said that we are too long sleeping upon our just rights. And this, too, is due to Europe, that the Governments of the Old World may know that 75,000,000 American citizens, speaking through their representatives in Congress, are a unit in maintaining the American doctrine of James Monroe; and it is also due to the independent Governments of the other America lying to the south of us, whose tenure of existence practically depends upon the honesty of the United States in sustaining the doctrine of the message of 1823.

Mr. President, it may be said that the Monroe doctrine already stands in force as a recognized part of our American policy. That is only true in a limited and qualified sense. It is a rule for the Executive, for the President of the United States, until he shall see fit, because of his own belief, to change it. Any President may abrogate or countermand it. We have already had two illustrations of this. Mr. Calhoun, who was a member of the Cabinet of President Monroe when the message was prepared, and who was afterwards in the Senate, took occasion, twenty-five years later, to greatly qualify, if not to entirely deny, the accepted meaning of the message of President Monroe.

And still later, John M. Clayton, Secretary of State under President Taylor, in making what was called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, consented to the use of such uncertain language that, very soon after it was ratified, Great Britain laid claim of dominion over certain of the territory which was covered by the treaty, and it required ten years of diplomatic negotiation before the United States fully regained what had been endangered by the action of the Taylor Administration.

I maintain, Mr. President, that this Government can not afford to permit any uncertain or equivocal construction to be possible upon so important a subject. The Monroe doctrine is the motto which should be indelibly engraved upon the portals of the Department of State. Instead of remaining as an edict of the Executive, it should bear the definite approval of Congress and become a fixed and permanent ordinance, giving notice to all the world that the United States will not view with favor the erection of any more European colonies on these continents, nor any extension of the European political system upon this hemisphere, nor any European interposition in the affairs of the Spanish-American Republics.

Mr. President, it has been seventy-two years since President Monroe, in his message to the Congress of the United States, declared the doctrine that—

> This Government would consider any attempt on the part of European powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety * * * and that it is impossible that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference.

It has been a little longer since Mr. Canning, representing the British Government, in writing to Mr. Rush, the American minister at the Court of St. James, expressed a desire that Great Britain and the United States should come to an understanding with each other that they would oppose any attempt by European powers to reduce or subjugate the Spanish-American colonies, or any part of them, by cession or conquest. The suggestion of the representative of the British Government looking to the recognition of the Spanish colonies in South and Central America more than seventy-two years ago, and suggesting that his Government and the United States Government should stand together against interference by the Alliance or other European power with the Spanish-American colonies, was followed soon thereafter by the proclamation of President Monroe. I desire to say, Mr. President, that the history of the country and of those times comes very near sustaining the proposition that the representative of the British Government was the first man to suggest to this country the doctrine, to which the American people have adhered ever since, called the Monroe doctrine. The Government has not stood by it with that constancy and force due alike to the people and the dignity of the nation. There has been a degree of weakness and vacillation at times which have been observed by other nations, and a consequent manifestation of disregard of what has long been known as the position of the United States.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, entered into between the United States and Great Britain in relation to a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua, etc., contained provisions which were in contravention of the Monroe doctrine, and which were repudiated by the Government since.

Mr. Blaine, while Secretary of State under Presidents Garfield and Arthur, in his instructions to Mr. Lowell, our minister to Great Britain, sets forth with great force and clearness the particulars in which the treaty should be modified. He discussed the treaty as it applied to the rights of parties connected with the proposed canal, but the suggestions applied with equal force to the soundness of the Monroe doctrine as relating to the acquisition of territory on this hemisphere by European powers.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, our Secretary of State when Lord Granville favored the assumption of joint control or a protectorate by several powers in case a canal should be constructed across the Isthmus, said in a letter to the British minister that the President would not consent to or look with indifference upon such an intervention in American affairs; that such a protectorate by European nations over the Isthmus transit would be in conflict with the American doctrine many years asserted by distinguished citizens, believed in by the people, and approved by Great Britain, and that—

> A protectorate over the proposed canal would seriously affect and threaten our political interests.

Mr. President, John Quincy Adams, in his letter to Mr. Middleton, July 23, 1823, in his usual direct and vigorous manner said, that—

> The future peace of the world and the interests of Russia herself can not be promoted by Russian settlements upon any part of the American continent. With the exception of the British establishments north of the United States, the remainder of the American continents must henceforth be left to the management of American hands.

The literature in support of the Monroe doctrine, as applied to the territory on this hemisphere and to interoceanic canals on our southern border, is almost endless; yet other nations seem not to regard it as having any force in guiding the conduct of the Government, and hence they proceed to the accomplishment of their purposes without much reference to it.

In my judgment, the time has come when the nation should put the question beyond cavil; the time has come when the nation, by its Congress, should declare the doctrine which has been so often declared by its Chief Executives and other representative men; the time has come when more positive language should be used than the old and oft-repeated declaration that "this Government can not view with indifference attempts of European Governments to colonize either in North, South, or Central America."

The nation has played diplomacy long enough, and without much effect. Great Britain has been disregarding polite requests, protests, arguments, and suggestions that we can not "look with indifference" upon her policy to reach out farther until she, if let alone, will finally dominate Venezuela, and what else I am not now prepared to say. The time has come for a plain, positive declaration of the Monroe doctrine by Congress, and then, if necessary, plain, positive enforcement of it against all comers.

Whatever European rights existed on this hemisphere in our early history as to ownership of territory must not be disputed. If there is dispute between nations as to boundary lines as they were, then let those lines be agreed upon by arbitration or in some way be fairly and honestly determined. The United States does not seek war with any nation, small or great. The days of wars between civilized nations are passed, certainly in relation to ordinary matters of dispute. We do not attempt to interfere in matters touching interests or controversies in European countries, and we do not intend that European powers shall interfere in political affairs in this Western Continent.

In the personal diary of John Quincy Adams, written when he was Secretary of State in President Monroe's Cabinet, he relates the particulars of a visit to him from Baron Tuyl, the Russian minister to this country. The question then at issue between the United States, Great Britain, and Russia was as to the title to the Northwestern Territory of North America, lying northward of the mouth of the Columbia River. Mr. Adams says (July 17, 1823):

> I told him (Baron Tuyl) specially that we would contest the right of Russia to any territorial establishment on this continent, and that we would assume distinctly the principle that the American continents are no longer subjects for any new European colonial establishments.

Charles Francis Adams says this is the first hint of the policy so well known afterwards as the Monroe doctrine. A few days before this, however, Secretary Adams, in a letter to Mr. Rush, our minister to Great Britain, had said, in speaking of the independent nations of South America and Mexico:

> The American continents henceforth will no longer be subject to colonization. And the Pacific Ocean, in every part of it, will remain open to the navigation of all nations, in like manner with the Atlantic.

The reason for this assertion of the American position is found in the fact that Spain, supported by the Holy Alliance of European nations, was taking preliminary steps to regain by force her former colonial possessions in South America and Mexico. All these colonies had cut loose from Spanish control, and all of them had organized independent Governments for themselves. This was the existing situation, and the United States, through President Monroe and Secretary John Quincy Adams, announced as its policy that no more European colonization would be permitted on this hemisphere. To understand how serious and important to us and to the people of both North and South America this ultimatum was, I will state the nature of the Holy Alliance, which had offered support to Spain in her design to again overrun America.

The Holy Alliance was a league concluded at Paris in 1815 between the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, signed personally with their own hands without the intervention of their ministers. It was really a league or compact to maintain the power and influence of their existing dynasties, although they made pretension of other reasons. It was presented for acceptance to nearly all European powers. All accepted it except Great Britain. The strong opposition of the Duke of Wellington prevented its adoption by the British Government. That power had conquered and banished Napoleon, and, fresh from victory, they felt equal to any emergency without invoking the aid of European allies.

Among the curious and interesting facts of history is the part taken by Great Britain then, as compared with her position now. England was then as now the great commercial power of the world, while Spain had degenerated to a second or third class power. England was building up a very profitable commerce with the independent States in South America which she did not wish interfered with by Spain or the Holy Alliance. So the British premier, Mr. Canning, proposed that the United States and Great Britain should join in a public declaration opposing the policy of the alliance in regard to American affairs, which I have already referred to, and asserting that the two countries would not view with indifference any foreign intervention in the affairs of Spanish-American governments. The American minister, Mr. Rush, consented to join in the arrangement provided England would acknowledge the independence of these newly formed Republics; but the negotiations went no further. The English Government, however, through Mr. Canning, informed France that Great Britain would not permit any European intervention in Spanish-American affairs, whereupon France disavowed any intention of so interfering; Prince Polignac stating that it was utterly hopeless to reduce Spanish-America to the state of its former relations with Spain.

Here was a practical announcement by England equivalent in meaning and almost in terms with the Monroe doctrine as proclaimed by President Monroe a few weeks after, and with it a practical acquiescence by France, almost simultaneously.

President Monroe addressed letters to the venerable ex-Presidents, Jefferson and Madison, asking their views and advice in regard to the situation which then confronted the Administration. Thomas Jefferson, at 80 years of age, writing from his retirement at Monticello in reply to President Monroe, on June 11, 1823, expressed much indignation at the course of Spain and her European allies in trying to dictate to the independent States of Southern and Central America as to their form of government. The Holy Alliance did not include Great Britain—

But—

Said Jefferson—

its presumption in dictating to an independent nation the form of its government is so arrogant, so atrocious, that indignation, as well as moral sentiment, enlists all our partialities and prayers in favor of one and our equal execrations against the other. I had ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their political interests are entirely distinct from ours. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their form and principles of government are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war. All their energies are expended in the destruction of labor, property, and lives of their people.

Again, on October 24, 1823, Mr. Jefferson, in reply to a letter from President Monroe, uses the following most courageous and impressive language:

DEAR SIR: The question presented by the letter you have sent me is the most momentous which has ever been offered to my contemplation since that of independence. That made us a nation; this sets our compass and points the course which we are to steer through the ocean of time opening upon us. And never could we embark upon it under circumstances more auspicious.

Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cisatlantic affairs. America, North and South, has a set of interests distinct from those of Europe, and peculiarly her own. She should therefore have a system of her own, separate and apart from that of Europe. While the last is laboring to become the domicile of despotism, our endeavor should surely be to make our hemisphere that of freedom. One nation, most of all, could disturb us in this pursuit; she now offers to lead, aid, and accompany us in it. Great Britain is the nation which can do us the most harm of any one, or all, on earth; and with her on our side we need not fear the whole world.

Mr. Monroe's message of December 2, 1823, is as follows:

The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow-men on the other side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements on this hemisphere we are of necessity more intimately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

I can not do better than to present here the eloquent words of Daniel Webster. Referring to this important state paper, in April, 1826, Mr. Webster, in the House of Representatives, said:

I look on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it or tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor. It elevated the hopes and gratified the patriotism of the people. Over those hopes I will not bring a mildew; nor will I put that gratified patriotism to shame.

Among the many considerations to which it is but just to refer, not the least important is the penchant of each of the great powers of Europe for the occupation and absorption of the territory of weak foreign nations whose productions are of importance to the trade and commerce of the great powers.

It has been the history of the monarchical countries of Europe for very many years that they have run races with each other in the capture and dismemberment of the smaller governments of the world. They have reduced many of these to the condition of mere satrapies, called colonies, wholly subordinate to their European conquerors. The history of these outrageous acts of nearly every European power of consequence is but a repetition, time after time, of the story of usurpation, tyranny, and bloodshed. A pretext is made, the inhabitants are driven off or enslaved, peacefully if possible, but with fire and sword if necessary; the country is occupied, and its whole material capabilities are made tributary to the conquering nation. Taxes, duties, and imposts of the utmost severity are collected from the helpless inhabitants, and thenceforward there is no more consideration shown toward the colony than the lion shows the lamb.

The only compassion or relenting which is ever manifested is that which will encourage the suffering people to produce a greater revenue for their masters. A hundred and twenty years ago that was the relation this country held toward the British Crown. Our people, our immediate ancestors, in their trade and manufactures, were as completely subjugated by the laws of England, enforced by the war power, as if they were suffering imprisonment under the penal statutes. The commercial and manufacturing interests of the United States, or rather of the colonies, as they were known prior to our Revolution, were wholly and absolutely at the mercy of the English Parliament.

In 1699 it was enacted by the Parliament—

That no wool yarn or woolen manufactures of the American plantations shall be shipped thence, or even laden, in order to be transported, on any pretense whatever.

In 1719 Parliament declared—

The erecting of manufactories in the colonies tends to lessen their dependence upon Great Britain.

In 1742 the British Board of Trade reported to Parliament that the Americans had begun to manufacture paper, which they said—

Interferes with the profits made by the British merchants.

Parliament instituted an inquiry, through the colonial governors, in relation to the progress of American manufactures, which resulted in showing that leather, a little poor iron, and cloths for domestic purposes were manufactured, all of which was considered to be—

Prejudicial to the trade and manufactories of Great Britain.

In response to this same board of trade, Parliament had already, in 1732, prohibited the exportation from the colonies of such articles of manufacture as interfered with like articles produced in England. In 1750 Parliament prohibited the erection of mills for rolling iron in the colonies, and also the making of steel, and if any such mills were found erected in any part of the colonies, the colonial governors were required to treat them as nuisances, and to destroy them under severe penalties for disobedience. The navigation laws prohibited the exportation of articles of colonial manufacture, and forbade any foreign commodity imported except in English ships.

Among the numerous complaints against Great Britain recited in our Declaration of Independence is this: "For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world." And the same policy of repression and subjugation has always been pursued by all the great nations toward their colonies.

The action of England toward the American colonies was the same as that of Spain, France, Holland, Denmark, and other European countries toward their colonial possessions. These remote colonies made subordinate to the home governments are the fields whence the revenues of the nations are collected, and where every sort of device is resorted to to keep the people down, that the home interests may be benefited.

The United States is the first great nation which has declined to establish any sort of protectorate or to maintain distant colonies. This is the first nation to follow a policy of absolute noninterference in the affairs of the other hemisphere. Whatever European countries may do toward each other we leave to them to arrange among themselves. We draw the line exactly where it existed at the time when President Monroe made his memorable declaration, and where we believe it should remain. We have no concern with foreign usurpations in Europe, or in any of the countries of the Eastern Hemisphere, where the welfare of the United States is not immediately affected. But we can not permit that the possessions of the independent Governments of America, either North or South, shall, either by negotiation or conquest, become subject to European domination. We should definitely proclaim, what we have by Executive authority announced, that any such act will be regarded as endangering our system and threatening our just supremacy upon the Western Hemisphere.

The experiment of a republican form of government, now in its second century, is entitled to have, and should have on this continent, its full development and operation. The American Republic, as the pioneer, and as the typical Government, in which the people are the real and ultimate sovereigns, is entitled to the right to protect itself as against encroachments of adverse and foreign powers in such way as is reasonable and just.

What authority entitles European nations to such a colonial foothold on our borders? They have planted their flags on all the scattering islands and in nearly every spot on earth where they could monopolize trade or control the strategic advantages of location for their own interests. But it is our duty to be always ready to meet any and all attempts they may make to approach unpleasantly near the established danger line. We offer no obstruction to their proper use of any transcontinental channel which may be constructed, but the control and sovereignty of such highway can never be held by any foreign power. Prior to 1823 certain rights had accrued to foreign powers and dominion had been exercised by them over certain territory on our borders, but since that time we have not consented to any extension of such dominion. We have reached the time when it becomes our bounden duty to say to the world, with dignity and firmness, that thus far, but no farther, shall foreign systems of government be permitted to approach. Our policy is the American policy, our doctrine is the protection of American interests, and our motto is "America for Americans."

We do not claim that the world is ours, but we will insist on our right to be consulted upon affairs pertaining to the American continents. We do not, like Don Quixote, go prancing about the world looking for adventures or seeking for some imprisoned princess or struggling nation to set free, but we acknowledge kinship in a degree with all the Republics of America, whose independence, like ours, has long since been acknowledged and recognized by the powers of Europe. The United States can not sit indifferently by when the territorial integrity of any of these neighboring countries is questioned by a foreign nation. We shall always be awake to any such attempt, and it is our business to see to it that their possessions are not curtailed materially from the just line established years ago by treaty stipulations. Anything short of this derogates from our dignity and tends to weaken the influence which the United States, as the mistress of the Western World, should maintain in American affairs.

I desire to submit to the Senate a further reason (if any further reason be needed) why the United States should no longer delay in announcing and proclaiming to the world by an authoritative statement from the legislative branch of the Government of its entire concurrence in the exposition of the American policy so clearly set forth by James Monroe. That reason is to be found in the expressions of the press and the public men of England in recent times. I quote from a cable telegram from London, dated November 15, 1895, as it appears in the Post of this city on that date:

William T. Stead, editor of the Review of Reviews, having seen the interview with Senator LODGE, replied at length to the statements made. England, he said, would never consent to any veto being placed on the freest possible expansion of the Pacific Ocean trade and settlements and the colonization of the Western World. He insisted that it would be absurd to submit the Venezuelan question to arbitration, especially with the example of the termination of the Alabama claims as an object lesson. In conclusion, he said he recognized the fact that the Americans were quite in a frame of mind to invent new doctrines if they found that the Monroe doctrine did not apply to Venezuela.

Editorially discussing the interview with HENRY CABOT LODGE on the Monroe doctrine, the London Chronicle says:

"Mr. Chamberlain, secretary of state for the colonies, is not likely to attempt to play the rôle of Napoleon of Venezuela. Unless the United States formally proclaims a protectorate over all of the South American Republics, we are bound to protect our citizens. Failing the establishment of such a protectorate, we do not see how loose policies like those of the Monroe doctrine can stop us from protecting the lives and property of English people in the New World."

There are Governments there, and those Governments can probably protect their citizens without any protectorate being thrown over them by the British Government or any other European power. Is it either politic or right that the press of Great Britain or of any other European country shall have any excuse for so determining or interpreting what the American policy is and what it means?

The people of the United States have already, so far as the Executive could determine it, plainly proclaimed the Monroe doctrine. All that is now demanded is the proclamation of the solemn and deliberate concurrence of the Congress of the United States to make it apparent to every European nation what are the will and temper of the American people. The voice of the United States so expressed will be as potent to settle the matter for future time as if it were thundered from the top of Sinai; and whether or not this Congress passes a declaration proclaiming what the Monroe doctrine is, the people of the United States will demand its enforcement as they understand it.

Conceding to the diplomatic authorities of all European countries at this day a due regard for honesty and propriety, we can not shut our eyes to the sad and miserable history of deceit, dishonesty, and duplicity which characterized so many of their predecessors during the hundred and more years of our national existence. We can not consent to leave open, even to the slightest possibility of misconception, the position of the United States. We can not allow that any European country, under the pretense of aggrandizing its citizens for alleged losses in speculative enterprises in the territories of the struggling States of South America, shall obtain an unrighteous sovereignty over any additional American soil.

I might read extracts by the hour from men like ex-President Polk, Mr. Cass, who was Secretary of State under Mr. Buchanan, and perhaps a hundred others, avowing the same doctrine in those days. Neither will the United States allow that, by diplomatic manipulation, with or without the concurrence of any weak South American government, any additional territory shall, by the assumption of a disputed boundary line, ever become tributary to, or a part of, any European sovereignty.

In addition to the urgent desire of Mr. Canning, as foreign secretary of England, that the United States should join England in an alliance for the compelling of a policy of noninterference by Europe with American territory, we have the eloquent words of another great English statesman in Parliament. Mr. Brougham, afterwards Lord Brougham, said:

The question with regard to South America is now disposed of, or nearly so, for an event has recently happened than which no event has dispersed greater joy, exultation, and gratitude over all the freemen of Europe; that event, which is decisive of the subject in respect to South America, is the message of the President of the United States to the Congress.

What was it? It was that there should not be any foreign interference with the political condition of the South American and Central American countries. And I may repeat here that France also, in view of the possibility that Spanish aggrandizement in America might disarrange the balance of power in Europe, was prompt to admit that the question was practically settled by the message of President Monroe.

Of course there is little doubt that the policy then proposed to us by England was wholly due to the selfish wish that no other European power than Great Britain should possess colonial possessions in America, but, nevertheless, the doctrine she advocated then is pertinent and proper for us now when it has a direct application to the present situation.

So long as the United States continues to maintain the salutary policy of noninterference with the complications and difficulties of Europe, and steadfastly adheres to her wise and just support of the Monroe doctrine, permitting no foreign nation to obtain additional foothold upon either North or South America, we shall have the undivided support of our people and demand the respect of the world. The moment we waver and weaken in our position, that moment we invite trouble. The announcement of President Monroe has sufficed until now as a beacon upon our course, but it is now fully time for the representatives of the people to provide against danger by unmistakable action. Let us put ourselves in a position so that we can say, like Percy—

Out of the nettle, danger, we can pluck the flower, safety.

Let us build so strongly and speak so plainly that the way of the future Executives, prime ministers, and ambassadors of our country shall be undoubted. Let it be so clear that no statesman of the future can find, as Mr. Calhoun did in the Senate, any ingenious theory to weaken its force and value. Let it be so certain and emphatic that no Secretary of State can hereafter become a willing party to a treaty yielding a share of the control and supervision of any interoceanic canal to any European country, as in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. And let it be so straight and practical that no American ambassador to the British court shall feel at liberty to question the policy of his own Government or, possibly, to apologize for the Declaration of Independence and the Monroe doctrine of 1823.

Mr. President, I desire now to call attention to one of the striking facts of the situation which confronts the United States. Probably very few of us have given careful attention to the vast extent of the European dominion upon this hemisphere. We may have casually understood, as a fact of some significance, that the area of the United States, including Alaska, approximates 3,600,000 square miles, but have we at the same time understood that the Dominion of Canada contains a total area of about 3,400,000 square miles?

Now, if we add to this the area of British Guiana, British Honduras, Bermuda, and the British West India Islands, 130,000 square miles more, it will give a total of 3,530,000 square miles of territory over which the British flag floats upon this hemisphere. If we had not purchased Alaska a few years ago, and added thereby a half million square miles to our domain, we should now fall many thousands of square miles short of the British possessions in America.

It would be useless for me to attempt to detail to you the thousand ways in which this close proximity of so vast an area of British territory affects our national well-being. Our entire northern boundary from Puget Sound to the Gulf of St. Lawrence bears the insignia of the British lion, and over the hundreds of islands which compose the West Indian Archipelago the British flag is flying. Not a sail of American commerce enters the Gulf of Mexico except by the tacit consent of foreign powers. With our 65,000,000 people, and their vigorous self-assertion, there has been no danger that such consent would be withheld. Any foreign embargo upon our free approach to the Mexican Gulf would be a blow which would recoil with deadly and terrific force upon those who attempted it. Its recoil would not stop with the naked assertion of the Monroe doctrine, but an American policy would develop into an imperial but honorable command of American affairs.

Look at the map. Between Canada and the United States there exists but an imaginary boundary line, over which a mere step takes us in a moment from a republic to a monarchy. Between the Bahama Islands and the State of Florida a sail of only four or five hours covers the distance. One can almost see the British flag from southern Florida. It floats over numbers of the smaller islands and coral reefs and keys a few miles away from Key West. A cordon of islands under foreign control swings all the way round from a point 50 or 60 miles off Florida nearly to British Guiana, on the South American coast.

But I started to present the striking fact that a great foreign power already possessed, at our very borders, a territorial area nearly equal to ours. No matter whether that power is warlike or peaceful, it is here. Its presence is an actual fact, and our experience with it in the past has been, that so long as we could command peace we could have peace. So long as we were able to protect our own interests, commercial and political, against adverse domination, so long those interests would continue and prosper.

All our diplomatic intercourse with the Government of Great Britain during the years in which we have been at peace has necessarily been characterized by constant watchfulness upon our part. At no time could we permit loose or unmeaning language in our diplomatic correspondence lest it should be taken advantage of. And for a good many years the nations of the world have been chary about leaving any unoccupied territory, or any scattering islands, unprotected overnight, for fear the morning would find them under the paw of the British lion. The United States does not covet what possessions England may have, and we have no desire to establish a protectorate over any others, but we are bound to insist that the status quo of 1823 shall be held inviolate in so far as the territorial limits of European establishments on this side of the Atlantic are concerned.

This Government has already indicated that the control of Cuba by any other European power than Spain would be regarded as inimical to our own welfare, and that the only alternative to which Americans would consent would be the absorption of Cuba by the United States. This policy regarding Cuba is probably well understood by the world, and it is, in fact, nothing more than a reiteration of the Monroe doctrine, as applied to conditions but slightly modified. The policy of the United States regarding Russian territory in America, as has been shown, was determined many years ago, and that was merely another expression of the Monroe doctrine as adapted to the then existing conditions.

How much more important and significant to the United States than in any of the exigencies noted where the Monroe doctrine or its equivalent has been asserted by our statesmen is the existing and now present condition in which our former rival competes with us for the control of North America? I do not mean by this to say that British rivalry for territorial control of America has again reached the physically aggressive stage, nor to say that such rivalry will ever lead to the final arbitrament of the strongest battalion or the heaviest armament; but I want to show to the Senate and to the country what the map of the world presents before us, and to make apparent the magnitude of the English dominion around and about us. This great area of British territory may or may not be a menace to our country. As is sometimes said, that depends. One thing, however, is manifest—that the United States must look after the United States. We are old enough and strong enough to stand alone, to walk alone, and to hold our ground amongst the nations of the earth.

Shall we do it? Shall we always be ready and prepared to meet great questions when they arise; to take every precaution against surprise, and to bear always the American standard at the fore? The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in the last Congress addressed the Senate and called to our attention as among the possibilities and even among the probabilities the speedy advancement of Japan to the rank of a great power militant. The distinguished Senator, as a wise statesman, in his remarks justifies the belief which I entertain, that it is the bounden duty of the legislators of the United States to be on the alert for every indication of the growing power and increasing significance of every foreign nation whose future situation may benefit or injure our own country. We should conduct our foreign affairs so justly, and with such reference to the progress of the world, that surprises will not affect us and that the troubles of other countries will pass us by.

In this connection, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a conversation which I see quoted here as having taken place in China between Mr. Curtis, a very able correspondent, and Mr. Li Hung Chang. Speaking to Mr. Curtis about this Government, Li Hung Chang said:

> Your Government and your people are very unwise, if they are not thinking of such things—

Referring to our naked condition of preparation for war—> particularly since the events that have occurred in China during the last year. The Japanese are a very aggressive people. They are a warlike people. They like to fight, and they are proud and arrogant. They do not care for the United States except as a market for their silk and tea, and if your Government ever interferes with their plans, either at home or in the Sandwich Islands, you will find that their friendship is only a pretense they keep up to encourage your trade. If President Cleveland had responded to my appeal for intervention during the late war, Japan would have sent her army and her ships from our harbors over to your country and would have taken possession of your Pacific States.

Mr. Curtis says he tried to explain the situation to Li Hung Chang, but "the Viceroy sneered in a contemptuous manner," and said:

> Japan has an army of over 200,000 soldiers, and the best guns in the world.

I suppose he realized that from China's experience in the late war.

> She has a larger and better fleet of warships than the United States. She has ten times as many torpedo boats as your Government, and her sailors know how to use them, while your sailors do not. You have only five ships on the Pacific Coast, with a coast line of 3,000 miles to protect, and several populous and wealthy cities that have no defenses whatever. You have no forts at San Francisco that could keep out the weakest gunboat in the navy of Japan, and a single ship of the Japanese navy could destroy every city on Puget Sound without the slightest difficulty in a week.

I refer to the interview, not that I indorse what Li Hung Chang says, but merely to call attention to the fact, known to everybody, that on the Pacific Coast we are not prepared for defense against hostile fleets; and I may say that the situation on our Atlantic Seaboard is not much better.

The growing industrial power of England in America is of quite as great significance to us as her territorial expansion. The railways of Canada, aided and sustained by government appropriations, have stimulated every branch of enterprise in that Dominion. The competition which has followed between Canada and the United States in regard to various great commercial and industrial undertakings has not been a subject of wholly unalloyed gratification to our people. It remains for us, as representatives of the people of the United States, to decide whether the great territory of Canada, with its sister colonies innumerable in the West Indies and elsewhere surrounding and guarding our own approaches to the Gulf of Mexico and to the delta of the Mississippi, shall be deemed as demanding any further assertion of our own policy. To my mind, the point has been reached and passed when doubt should exist as to the complete maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, broadly construed. Not only so, but the rapidly approaching and pressing question is to be, and is now, what additional declaration and assertion is demanded as a logical step in the progress of the Republic. That is the question of this day, the problem of this age.

Mr. SQUIRE. Before the Senator from Illinois takes his seat I should like to ask him whether he deems the defenses on the Atlantic coast adequate to enable us to withstand any attempt, either to bombard our cities or to exact tribute, which may be made by any foreign power having a respectable navy?

Mr. CULLOM. I stated in the course of my remarks that the Pacific coast is practically defenseless, and that the Atlantic coast is not in a very much better condition.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Illinois what disposition he proposes shall be made of the resolution?

Mr. CULLOM. I stated at the outset of my remarks that unless some Senator desired to discuss the resolution I should ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HILL. I would suggest that the resolution lie on the table for a day or two.

Mr. CULLOM. I am entirely content that that course shall be pursued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table for the present, in the absence of objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 11, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 10, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Samuel W. Prior, administrator, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States for the fiscal year 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the cases of W. W. Perkins, administrator, and sundry other cases, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of John H. Caldwell, James Carroll, John R. Hornbaker, and W. H. Grimes, administrators, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF THE CHEROKEE NATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States reviewing and reporting upon certain conclusions of law reached by the Department of the Interior in an account of moneys due the Cherokee Nation; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the finding filed by the court in the cases of J. L. Cochran, administrator, Timothy Foley, and Mrs. Sarah Townsley, administratrix, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of David Maberry, jr., vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of William T. Robertson, administrator of Ira A. Sprouse, deceased, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCRAE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. SULLOWAY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GARDNER, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. BROWN, for this day, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. HANLY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of Charles W. Sentman, no adverse report having been made.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I made objection yesterday to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURRELL] to withdraw papers in a certain case. I have since ascertained that a favorable report has been made on the case, and no unfavorable report. I therefore renew the request of the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw those papers without leaving copies.

Mr. BURRELL. Mr. Speaker, this claim has been pending in the last four Congresses, in each of which a favorable report has been made. The object of withdrawing the papers at this time is to submit the claim to the Auditor of the War Department, by whom, we think, it can be settled without troubling Congress further.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the request in the form now submitted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURRELL asks unanimous consent to withdraw from the House files, without leaving copies, the papers in the claim of Mrs. Fannie Pemberton, no adverse report having been made thereon.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 17) providing for certain surveys in the State of Florida; and Joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-house at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next. In making this motion I desire to say that when the House adjourned yesterday until to-day the expectation was that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury would be sent in at this time, but I am informed that it is not expected until Thursday. However, if any gentleman has information that the report will be ready to be presented to-morrow I will withdraw the motion, for I suppose it is the desire of the House that this important report should be laid before it at the earliest possible moment. [A pause.] As I get no response, I now renew my motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

THE BATTLE SHIP TEXAS.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, when appointed, be directed to investigate the reports that the battle ship Texas is faulty in construction. The committee is authorized and directed to inquire into all matters pertaining to the plans, construction, cost, and seaworthiness of said ship.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISCHER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I think that ought to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] objects.

OCCUPANCY OF FEDERAL COURT ROOM, SCRANTON, PA.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution granting permission to the Pennsylvania superior court to occupy the Federal court room in Scranton.

Whereas by an act of assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved June 24, 1895, an intermediate court of appeals was established, known and styled as the superior court of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas by the third section of said act, it is provided that one session of said court shall be held at Scranton and one at Williamsport in each year; and

Whereas it is further provided in said act that the commissioners of each of said counties shall provide a suitable place for the meeting and business of said court at each of said places, to wit, Scranton and Williamsport, the expense thereof to be paid by the State of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas the commissioners of said counties can not furnish a suitable place for the meeting and business of said superior court without adequate time for that purpose, and said county commissioners are desirous of obtaining the use of the United States court room at Scranton during the month of January in each year for five years, and at Williamsport in the month of February in each year for five years, paying therefor an adequate rental; and

Whereas during the sessions of the circuit and district courts of the United States at Scranton and Williamsport the commissioners of the counties of Lackawanna and Lycoming have furnished a room and facilities for the meeting of the circuit court when the district court was in session and are willing to do so in the future when so requested: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That full permission be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of Pennsylvania and to the superior court of said State to occupy the United States court room and the rooms connected therewith at Scranton, in the county of Lackawanna, during the month of January, and at Williamsport, in the county of Lycoming, during the month of February, in each year for the period of five years from the time such occupation shall begin, to wit, January, 1896, for the purpose of holding the sessions of said court therein, and that during said period concurrent jurisdiction so far as is necessary over said property be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the State of Pennsylvania for said purposes, so that the sessions of said courts in said buildings and rooms may be, during said period, fully legalized: Provided, That the commissioners of each of said counties of Lackawanna and Lycoming shall pay to the United States each the sum of $100 per annum for the use of said rooms for the time aforesaid: And provided further, That said rooms shall be kept in good repair at the expense of the State of Pennsylvania, and that said commissioners shall further provide necessary light and heat for said rooms at their own expense, and at the end of said period of five years the use of said rooms shall be relinquished to the United States by the said State of Pennsylvania and the said superior court in as good condition as before the occupancy of said rooms by said court: Provided further, That the sessions of said superior court shall in no way interfere with the sessions of the said circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read also the amendments which I have sent to the desk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 9, strike out the words "time such occupation shall begin, to wit" and insert "first day of."

Strike out the preamble.

In line 19, after the word "each," strike out the words "the sum of one hundred dollars per annum" and insert "the sum of five hundred dollars, to be paid in five yearly payments."

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The consideration of this joint resolution at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before that is given I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he has any objection to an amendment in the form of a proviso that the proposed arrangement shall be carried out only if, in the judgment of the Attorney-General, it can be done without injury to the public service. This resolution proposes to provide for the occupancy of a Federal court room jointly by a State court and by the Federal courts, and it seems to me that some difficulty may arise; but if the matter were left entirely under the control of the Attorney-General, that, I think, would remove any liability to conflict which might otherwise exist.

Mr. SCRANTON. Mr. Speaker, the only objection I have to the gentleman's suggestion is based upon the necessity for settling this matter without delay. The superior court is to be organized in Scranton early in January. The amendments which I have sent up are simply intended to make the joint resolution conform to the one that was passed by the Senate yesterday, and I fear that an additional amendment might cause further delay. It is not the intention to use this building for the State courts any longer than is absolutely necessary. The accommodations in the present court-houses at Scranton and at Williamsport are quite inadequate. The commissioners are to provide rooms immediately. The term of five years is named in the joint resolution as the limit, but in all probability the occupancy will not continue half that time. I have seen the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury about the matter, and there is no objection in that office.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCRANTON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which has been read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will ask the gentleman whether he has conferred with the Attorney-General about this matter.

Mr. SCRANTON. I have conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. Suppose the Government should require the occupancy of this entire building for its own purposes, there is no provision in this joint resolution that it can resume entire control.

Mr. SCRANTON. My understanding was that the Secretary of the Treasury is the custodian of these buildings, and not the Attorney-General.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is so as to the custody of the building, but as to the occupation of it for court purposes, I suppose the Attorney-General has control.

Mr. SCRANTON. The gentleman may be right about that.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not desire to raise any objection, but I can conceive that such joint occupancy as is here proposed, without a proviso that the Attorney-General, or some officer of the Federal Government shall have authority to examine into the matter and ascertain whether the arrangement can be made without detriment to the public service, might give rise to difficulty.

Mr. SCRANTON. There is no difficulty whatever about it. The question has been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I am expecting a letter from him this morning.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman has investigated the matter and it can be done without injury to the public service, by causing a conflict in the manner I have suggested, I have no objection.

Mr. SCRANTON. The United States court meets in March and this provides for January.

Mr. SAYERS. I think this bill should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION, HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Thomas F. Bayard, the ambassador of the United States to Great Britain, is reported by the London Times newspaper to have said in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on the 2d day of August, 1895, "The President stood in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people; men who sought to have their own way. It took a real man to govern the people of the United States;" and

Whereas said Bayard is further reported by the press of this country to have said in a public speech delivered in Edinburgh, Scotland, on the 7th day of November, 1895, "In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of a form of socialism styled protection, which has done more to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind from public councils, and to lower the tone of national representation than any other single cause. Protection now controlling the sovereign power of taxation has been perverted from its proper function of creating revenue to support the Government into an engine of selfish profit allied with combinations called trusts. It thus has sapped the popular conscience by giving corrupting largesses to special classes, and it throws legislation into the political market where jobbers and chafferers take the place of statesmen;" and

Whereas it is not one of the functions of an ambassador to insult in the country to which he is accredited the people he is supposed to represent, and it is consistent neither with the character of the office nor with the dignity and independence of the people of the United States that their ambassadors abroad should make violent partisan speeches on questions relating to our domestic policy upon foreign soil: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to inform the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interests, what steps, if any, he has taken to ascertain whether said Bayard made said speeches, and if he has ascertained that he did make said speeches, what steps, if any, he has taken to recall or to censure said Bayard.

The SPEAKER. This resolution requires unanimous consent. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think this resolution should go to some committee, and I therefore object to its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

PROPOSED IMPEACHMENT OF HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a question of privilege. I send to the desk a document which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I do impeach Thomas F. Bayard, United States ambassador to Great Britain, of high crimes and misdemeanors on the following grounds:

Whereas the following report of a speech delivered before the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution by Hon. Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States of America at the Court of Great Britain, is published in the London News under date of November 8, 1895:

"The opening address of the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution was delivered last night by Mr. Bayard, ambassador of the United States of America, who selected for the subject 'Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence.' In his own country, he said, he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled 'protection,' which he believed had done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

"Step by step, and largely owing to the confusion of civic strife, it had succeeded in obtaining control of the sovereign power of taxation, never hesitating at any alliance or to resort to any combination that promised to assist its purpose of perverting the public taxation from its only true justification and function of creating revenue for the support of the whole people into an engine for the selfish private profit of allied beneficiaries and combinations called trusts.

"Under its dictation individual enterprise and independence had been oppressed and the energy of discovery and invention debilitated and discouraged. It had unhesitatingly allied itself with every policy which tended to commercial isolation, dangerously depleted the Treasury, and sapped the popular conscience by schemes of corrupting favor and largesse to special classes, whose support was thereby affected.

"Thus it had done much to throw legislation into the political market, where jobbers and chafferers took the place of statesmen.

"It was incorrect to speak of protection as a national policy, for that it could never be, because it could never be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest; and this overthrew the great principle of equality before the law, and that resultant sense of justice and equity in the administration of sovereign powers which was the true cause of domestic tranquillities and human contentment.

"The enfeeblement of individual energies and the impairment of manly self-reliance were necessarily involved, and the belief in mysterious powers of the State, and reliance upon them, took the place of individual exertion, fostered the growth of state socialism, and personal liberty ceased to be the great end of the Government."

And whereas such reflections on the Government's policy and people of the United States by an ambassador of the United States to a foreign country and before a foreign audience is manifestly in serious disregard of the proprieties and obligations which should be observed by an official representative of the United States abroad, and calculated to injure our national reputation:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be directed to ascertain whether such statements have been publicly made; and if so, to report to the House such action by impeachment or otherwise as shall be proper in the premises. For the purpose of this inquiry the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon that I demand the previous question.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOPKINS. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will not demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that the gentleman from Georgia arose to make a point of order. If he does not, the Chair of course will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CRISP. I raise the question as to whether this constitutes a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia upon the point of order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear distinctly the resolution which accompanied the preamble. Will the Chair kindly direct the reading of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress a ruling was made by the Speaker which seems to cover this question. While it is held that propositions to impeach the civil officers of the United States are privileged under the Constitution, yet the ruling in the Forty-eighth Congress, which seems to cover this case, is to the effect that a reference to a committee of charges or allegations against a civil officer, with instructions to that committee to ascertain and report articles of impeachment, or otherwise, as may be necessary, does not constitute a privileged question. Mr. Springer presented, as a question of privilege, the petition of Richard W. Webb, a citizen of the Territory of New Mexico, relating to the impeachment of Samuel Axtell, the chief justice of the Territory, and with it a resolution—

That the petition of Richard W. Webb and accompanying statement of charges against Samuel B. Axtell, the chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico and judge of the First judicial district thereof, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and ascertain whether the allegations contained in the foregoing charges and specifications are true, and whether the conduct of the said chief justice or judge has been such as to render him unfit to discharge the duties of the office of chief justice or judge as aforesaid, and report thereon to the House such action, to be taken by impeachment or otherwise, as they may advise; and in making such examination and investigation the said committee have power to send for persons or papers.

Mr. Kasson made the point of order that a question of privilege was not presented by the said memorial and resolution.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, on the ground that the resolution proposed an investigation of certain charges set forth in said memorial and accompanying papers against the said Axtell, and did not specifically propose articles of impeachment.

That seems to be on all fours with the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the reference made by the gentleman from Georgia I have before me, and I believe it has been correctly stated by him; but I propose to show by a subsequent decision of the same Speaker that the resolution which I have offered is a matter of privilege.

The resolution to which the gentleman has referred was introduced on the 4th day of February, 1884. It was based upon a petition signed by certain citizens of the Territory of New Mexico, and, containing as it did no specific charges of impeachment, the Speaker ruled that it was not a question of privilege. But on the 2d day of December, 1884, being ten months subsequent to the matter to which he has referred, the same Speaker, Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, being in the chair, Mr. Follett, of Ohio, offered a resolution beginning in the exact phraseology of the resolution which I have offered, to wit:

I do impeach Lot Wright, United States marshal of the southern district of Ohio, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

The resolution then recited the misdemeanors which were alleged to have been committed by the said Lot Wright, and concluded in a resolution almost identical with the one which I have presented, to wit, that an investigation of the truth or falsity of these charges be made by a subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, with the authority to send for persons and papers, and to report to the House.

Upon that resolution, according to the Journal:

Mr. Keifer made the point of order that the said resolutions were not in order, being a proposition to investigate certain charges against an officer of the United States, and did not specifically propose articles of impeachment against said officer.

Upon which the Speaker overruled the point of order—

Upon the ground that under the established practice of the House all propositions to impeach a public officer who is impeachable under the Constitutino are privileged, and as the proposition submitted by Mr. Follett did specifically contain a proposition to impeach an officer so impeachable, it came within the established rule and practice of the House.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the precedent cited by the gentleman from Georgia does not apply to this case, for this reason: The case to which he refers was the introduction of a petition, upon which no charge of impeachment was made by a member of the House. The resolution which I have presented, following exactly the precedent of December 2, 1884, does make such an impeachment in the words:

I do impeach Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States at the Court of Great Britain, etc.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order should be overruled.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, this presents a very important question, important as a matter of practice. The gentleman from Massachusetts rises in his place and presents a resolution with a preamble, the recitations of which declare that he impeaches a high civil officer of the United States. The resolution, which of course is the gist of the matter, directs a committee of the House to inquire whether or not it is a suitable case for impeachment. In a case identical with that, in the Forty-eighth Congress, the first case referred to, the Speaker held that it was not privileged, and the effect of that ruling, the Speaker will bear in mind, is not to deprive the House of an opportunity of preferring articles of impeachment, it is not to limit, it is not to embarrass the House in the exercise of that constitutional right, but the effect of it is simply that the resolution shall go to a committee which can examine it and report whether or not articles of impeachment shall be preferred; in other words, it gives to the House the judgment of a committee rather than of an individual member as to whether articles of impeachment should be preferred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it should be held that on a resolution like this the gentleman presenting it can address the House for one hour as a privileged question, the Chair will at once see the embarrassment that might arise and must arise, whereas if the decision of the Speaker of the Forty-eighth Congress is adopted in the case to which I referred and the resolution is referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, that committee can examine and report to the House whether or not other steps should be taken in the case.

I have not had time to carefully examine the case referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have it before me, and I do not see just now the distinction between that case and the case to which I have referred. In the first case it was distinctly held that the matter was not privileged. In this case the Speaker held the resolution to be privileged. There must be some distinction between the two, but exactly what it is, as I say, I have not had opportunity to examine and discover; but it seems to me that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is exactly similar to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Springer], and on that the Speaker held the point of order well taken. It seems to me, therefore, in this case, as a matter of practice, if there be any doubt, it is better to resolve the doubt in favor of reference without debate to a standing committee of the House in order that the House may be informed, after some sort of an investigation, whether there is anything on which articles of impeachment may be sustained if preferred.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest to the honorable gentleman from Georgia that this is not a question of political policy. It is a question of conforming to the rules and precedents of the House.

I have shown to him that the resolution to which he refers contains no charge of impeachment by any member of the House, but is simply a petition from certain citizens of New Mexico. I have shown to him that, on a subsequent day, by the decision of the same Speaker, being Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky, on a resolution in exactly the same form in substance as the resolution which I have presented, when a point of order against its being a question of privilege was made, Mr. Carlisle, then Speaker, declared it to be a question of privilege. The distinction is very clear.

In the first case to which the gentleman refers no member of the House made a charge of impeachment; in the second, which I have cited, Mr. Follett of Ohio did make a charge of impeachment, and that language I have literally followed in the resolution which I have submitted.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that there is a great distinction between the two cases. The Chair has examined the decision of the Speaker of the House made on the 2d day of December, 1884, and sees no reason why he should not adopt that opinion. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to consider the resolution I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he desires any time for debate, and see if an arrangement can be made in this case, so that a vote can be taken at a certain time.

Mr. CRISP. I beg pardon?

Mr. BARRETT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he desires to debate the resolution which I have offered and, in case he does, to see whether an arrangement can be made by which a vote can be taken at a specified time.

Mr. CRISP. Why, of course, it will depend upon what the gentleman from Massachusetts may state as to whether time will be desired. I think the resolution ought to be referred to the committee having charge of these matters.

Mr. BARRETT. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to detain this House many moments in the consideration of the resolution which I have presented. In common, I think I may say, with every right-minded citizen of the United States, I have read with feelings of humiliation the reported insults and excesses in language committed toward this Government and this people by the present ambassador of the United States at the Court of Great Britain.

The resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. MCCALL] recites in epitome not only the more extended report which I have had read, but also another statement made by the ambassador, in which he refers to the American people as an unruly and turbulent people, needing the strong hand of a certain man, to wit, Mr. Grover Cleveland, to keep them in submission.

I am, however, pleased to see, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Cleveland does not accord with that view of his duty. Having left this Congress and the people of the United States during the past four days without the restraint of his overruling hand, he does not, I assume, believe that the statement made by his ambassador is in any way correct. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, this statement of the ambassador which I have had read is in violation of diplomatic usage, is in violation of the printed instructions given to him by the Department of State when he left these shores, and is in violation of every patriotic impulse which a man who takes the commission of this country in his hands is in honor bound to respect.

The question may be raised on the other side as to a precedent for this proposed action.

I reply, Mr. Speaker, that in all the history of this country there is no precedent. There is no precedent, because no minister of this country in a foreign land, up to the current political year, has ever felt called upon, before a foreign audience and under a foreign flag, to insult the nation whose commission he bore. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There is, however, Mr. Speaker, one precedent, which, while not exactly fitting to this case, does apply in principle so effectively that I shall refer to it on this occasion.

Going back some sixty years, we find that during the Administration of Andrew Jackson, after a prolonged controversy in regard to the composition of the Cabinet as it then existed, the previous Secretary of State, Mr. Martin Van Buren, was nominated by the President to the Senate as our minister to England. When that nomination came up in the Senate a long and bitter debate occurred upon it. It touched so closely the springs of American diplomatic principles that, some time subsequent thereto, the debate (which had occurred in executive session of the Senate) was made public.

The charge alleged against Mr. Van Buren was that as Secretary of State, in dispatching Mr. McLane as minister to Great Britain, he had given him certain objectionable instructions to be used in his negotiations with the British foreign office. The gist of the instructions, to which objection was made, was that the minister should call the attention of the British foreign office to the fact that, by the Presidential election of 1828, the Administration of this Government had passed from one political party to another, and, there having been controversy in the previous Administration of Mr. Adams in regard to certain diplomatic matters relating to our trade with the West India Islands, Mr. McLane was authorized by the instructions given by Mr. Van Buren, as Secretary of State, to call the attention of the British foreign office to the fact of the change of Administration here, and to suggest that negotiations theretofore interrupted might with propriety be resumed, because the Administration of Mr. Jackson, which the minister represented, did not indorse the position taken by the previous Administration of Mr. Adams.

You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that in that case the instructions were those of a Secretary of State to a minister. They were given by the Secretary of State of the United States to a minister to Great Britain. They directed him to call attention to an undisputed fact. They merely recited something that was as well known as the rising and the setting of the sun.

But, inasmuch as our minister was thereby authorized to make, in his negotiations with the British foreign office, some reference to the internal affairs of this country and to the changes by which one political party had been raised in the public estimation and another political party lowered, serious objection was taken to the instructions, and, as I have already said, there occurred in the Senate of the United States, in executive session, a debate, which is printed in Gales & Seaton's History of the Debates.

In that debate Daniel Webster, than whom no more patriotic and loyal man ever lived, or one better qualified to discuss such matters, made a speech, the essence of which, written out by himself, is here given.

I will ask the Clerk to read the passages which I have marked, beginning on the third line of page 1333.

The Clerk read from Mr. Webster's speech as follows:

Sir, I would forgive mistakes; I would pardon the want of information; I would pardon almost anything where I saw true patriotism and sound American feeling, but I can not forgive the sacrifice of this feeling to mere party.

I can not concur in sending abroad a public agent who has not conceptions so large and liberal as to feel that, in the presence of foreign courts, amidst the monarchies of Europe, he is to stand up for his country, and his whole country; that no jot nor tittle of her honor is to come to harm in his hands; that he is not to suffer others to reproach either his Government or his country, and far less is he himself to reproach either; that he is to have no objects in his eye but American objects, and no heart in his bosom but an American heart; and that he is to forget self, to forget party, to forget every sinister and narrow feeling in his proud and lofty attachment to the Republic whose commission he bears.

Mr. President, I have discharged an exceedingly unpleasant duty, the most unpleasant of my public life. But I have looked upon it as a duty, and it was not to be shunned. And, sir, however unimportant may be the opinion of so humble an individual as myself, I now only wish that I might be heard by every independent freeman in the United States, by the British minister and the British King, and by every minister and every crowned head in Europe, while standing here in my place I pronounce my rebuke, as solemnly and as decisively as I can, upon this first instance in which an American minister has been sent abroad as the representative of his party and not as the representative of his country.

[Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts permit me one question?

Mr. BARRETT. I can not consent to be interrupted, but when I have finished the course of my remarks——

Mr. COOPER of Florida. My inquiry is pertinent to this question, and I will not detain the gentleman a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will be in order.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I understood the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida has no right to interrupt a member without his consent.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I have not undertaken to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. If the gentleman will not permit me——

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, those were the words of Daniel Webster, uttered in the secrecy of an executive session of the Senate of the United States.

The importance of that discussion was so great that by the vote of the Senate the proceedings were made public.

Though the feeling in the Senate in those days was much stronger than now that the Executive prerogative should be respected, nevertheless in a Senate so composed, and in spite of personal appeals made to Senators to allow the nomination to be confirmed, Mr. Van Buren, because of a statement which was not one-tenth so open to objection as the one which Mr. Bayard is reported to have made, was rejected. The Senate refused to confirm his nomination on the ground outlined by Mr. Webster.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will ask you how much time I have left.

The SPEAKER. Fifty minutes.

Mr. BARRETT. As there are other gentlemen on this side of the House to whom I desire to yield a portion of my time in this matter, realizing too fully my own inexperience and lack of knowledge of the course of debate on this floor, I now yield the floor, reserving the remainder of my time.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman, before yielding the floor, permit me a question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts now permit me to ask——

Mr. BARRETT. If the gentleman desires to debate this resolution, I will refer him to the gentleman from Georgia, who will have his own time, and will doubtless allow the gentleman a part of it.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. I do not wish to debate the resolution, but to ask a question. The gentleman from Massachusetts has gotten up here and made an attack upon a distinguished citizen of the United States; and he has read a record here. He said that when he had finished his remarks he would respond to a question. I do not wonder that the gentleman is afraid to answer questions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman wishes to ask me a question, and not to take up my time in debate, I shall be glad to answer him.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Then I ask the gentleman whether, after those occurrences in the Senate to which he has referred, the American people did not vindicate Martin Van Buren, largely on account of those attacks in the Senate, by electing him President of the United States, as they will vindicate the views on high protection and McKinleyism of Thomas F. Bayard if you dare to make the issue in the next election? [Applause on the Democratic side, and derisive cries on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman asks me as a matter of historical fact whether or not Martin Van Buren was elected President of the United States after those occurrences, I answer that he was. But I make the additional reply that he was the first representative of his party up to that time who, having served four years in the Presidential chair, was by the voice of this people buried so deep in the election of 1840 that his name has since scarcely been heard of. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I suppose, of course, the House fully understands that the purpose of this resolution is to give gentlemen an opportunity to air their views on the subject of the tariff. I assume there is no man who has ever been elected to the Congress of the United States by any party who could seriously believe that the allegations in this resolution constitute good ground of impeachment. I acquit the gentleman from Massachusetts of any such idea or thought. My respect for his intelligence demands that I should do so.

Now, on examining these resolutions, it will be found that they criticise our ambassador to Great Britain for remarks made by him on a public occasion in Scotland. The subject of his address was "Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence." I have not a copy of the entire address before me, or I should be glad to put it in the RECORD, because I have no doubt, from the extract the gentleman has recited, that it was a clear and able speech against the pernicious doctrine of protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me read to you some of the charges which the gentleman from Massachusetts makes against the ambassador. He claims that he should be impeached because he has said that protection has—

> Done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, to familiarize it with reliance upon State aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble, than any other single cause.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, if we impeach all persons who approve the views thus expressed, we must impeach a majority of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side, and derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Some of the older members on this floor may remember that the Republicans had a majority in the Fifty-first Congress; not, it is true, a large majority at the beginning, but by Republican methods they worked it up considerably. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] That Congress passed what is known as the McKinley tariff bill, the very kind of protection, I have no doubt, the gentleman from Massachusetts approves of. That Congress passed the bill, and we went to the people of the United States on that issue.

Mr. BOUTELLE. When? Last year? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I suppose one who has served so long with him must pardon the rudeness of the gentleman from Maine. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not know of anyone who will do so with more grace than the gentleman from Georgia who now occupies the floor.

Mr. CRISP. I am sure I will, sincerely.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the two parties went to the country on the issue raised by that bill—on the question of protection—the high protection of the McKinley bill. There was no question at that time fully discussed other than the tariff. The financial question, which more recently has caused so much division, cut at that time small figure comparatively. All over the country the question was the high rates of the McKinley bill against lower rates.

Do you gentlemen remember what took place, or have you in your rejoicing at your great majority to-day forgotten? Having a majority here of from 20 to 30—I do not remember exactly the majority—you passed the McKinley bill. We went to the country on the issue thus presented, and in the next Congress this side had a majority of nearly 150. Therefore it is I say, if you should impeach men who entertain the views expressed by Mr. Bayard you must impeach the majority of the people of the United States.

I want to read you a little more of this preamble.

> It was incorrect to speak of protection as a national policy, for that it could never be, because it could never be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest, and this overthrew the great principle of equality before the law and that resultant sense of justice and equity in the administration of sovereign powers which was the true cause of domestic tranquillity and human contentment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that side of the House have a very large majority. You can pass any legislation you please by a two-thirds vote. If you believe that the people of this country approve the McKinley bill, or anything like it, you owe it to yourselves, you owe it to the country, to frame a bill and pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That side has twitted this side with the Wilson bill. When we were considering the bill you had nothing but criticisms of it. Now, you can make a bill. You say the revenues are short. You say they should be increased on protective lines. Have the manhood to present your bill and pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do not say, as now and then you hear some Republican leader saying, "It is no use for us to pass a bill, because possibly it will not pass the Senate, or if it passes the Senate possibly it will meet with an Executive veto."

My friends, take your own responsibility. Prepare your tariff bill, bring it in, pass it, and go to the country upon it. There is no other way in which you can justify your own position, or in which you can successfully assail the position of this side in the enforcement or passage of the existing law.

From time to time during this session of Congress we shall hear all kinds of speeches assailing the Wilson tariff bill, assailing this side for passing such a law. And yet, I believe now this Congress will adjourn without the passage of any general tariff bill through this House. It is an old plan of the Republicans to evade responsibility.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] precipitates this discussion in an unusual way by preferring, as he says, articles of impeachment. Of course he knows there is nothing in that. Of course he only expected thus to have an opportunity to make his remarks and have them go to the country; but it shows that, so far as that gentleman is concerned, at least, he is thoroughly wedded to the idea of protection. Now, we count upon him as we count upon every man who shall vote for this resolution to insist that his party shall frame a bill which carries out the Republican idea of protection. Let the country see, before the election, what you propose to do. The Republican party has never done that as to the tariff. The majority it acquired in the Fifty-first Congress it acquired on the idea of revising the tariff, correcting inequalities, and reducing the tariff by its friends; but when intrusted with power it elevated the schedules on almost every item, and when the people came to pass upon it, as I said just now, they condemned it.

Now, passing from that, this resolution, in the orderly course of business, ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, the law committee of the House.

Here is a proposition to refer articles of impeachment to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That, it seems to me, is itself an unheard-of proposition. The committee which has always charge of matters of impeachment in this House is the Committee on the Judiciary. For that reason this resolution ought not to pass, and I give notice that before the resolution is voted upon I shall make a motion—I would make it now, but perhaps it might cut off debate, which I do not desire—I shall make a motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I reserve that time.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. MCCALL] of Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCALL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a resolution, which I placed before the House this morning, to carry out a promise I made to my constituents that I would call the matter of Mr. Bayard's speeches to the attention of the House of Representatives. It was not my idea when I presented that resolution that there would be immediate consideration of it, but I thought that it might go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for their consideration and then be referred back to the House for debate. Whether or not Mr. Bayard should be impeached for the speeches he has made, certainly something should be done. He should receive the stamp of the disapproval of this Administration, as he has already received the disapproval of the American people.

Now, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] is altogether too learned not to see that he has confused the question. The question is not whether Mr. Bayard has been upon the right side of one of our domestic questions in the speeches he has delivered in Great Britain. Ever since the 4th day of July, 1776, the place for the discussion of questions of our domestic policy has been within the territory of these United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Before that time the place where these questions could properly be discussed was in Edinburgh or in London, but the time when that was proper ceased then.

Now, Mr. Bayard has made in Edinburgh what I think everybody will admit to have been a violent partisan speech. I assert that it was an obvious impropriety, a thing unbecoming the office that he held, to submit an address to the people there upon questions that should be presented before the American people. If Mr. Bayard wants to make speeches on free trade or protection for this country, then he should come home. The place for him to do it is not in Great Britain. Mr. Bayard's offense is so astounding that international law has no name for it. We have known of instances where an ambassador has proved to be persona non grata to the country to which he was accredited, but we have yet to learn of an ambassador being persona non grata to his own country. Not very many years ago Mr. Bayard applied this doctrine of persona non grata to the then minister of Great Britain to this country, who in the course of a private and personal letter intimated what was then the palpable but is now the demonstrated truth, that British interests would be subserved by the triumph of the Democratic party in the United States. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Bayard said that Mr. Sackville West should be recalled; and he was right in so saying, although Mr. Sackville West stated nothing but the absolute truth. Mr. Bayard's grave offense as to his Edinburgh speech is that, whether it was right or wrong, it was unbecoming and improper for him to make it there, and I believe that this House of Representatives, without distinction of party, before we have finished with this subject, will declare that it was unbecoming and improper for him, holding the position as our ambassador, to make the speech he did make in Edinburgh.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bayard made a speech in August last, in old Boston, in England, upon which I notice the gentleman from Georgia does not comment. In that speech he declared that the American people were a "violent people;" that they were "in need of a strong ruler;" and I state when he made that speech he misrepresented not only the American people, but their form of government. The American people have no master. Their President is great because they are great. He is great not because he is their master, but because he is the chief servant of the people of this country. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, when this matter shall come before the House again, as I trust it will, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or from some other committee, I may indulge in some further observations; but I will add nothing now, except that it seems to me the President of the United States can not feel greatly flattered when his ambassador, who should be our ambassador abroad, in order to praise him found it necessary to abuse and insult the American people. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the orderly conduct of this debate would require that the other side should take their time in alternation with this side. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he desires further discussion?

Mr. CRISP. How much time has been used on that side?

Mr. BARRETT. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whereas in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on the 2d day of August, 1895, the said Bayard is reported by the press of this country to have said: "The President stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people, men who desire to have their own way, and who need to have that way frequently obstructed, and I tell you plainly it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BARRETT. I would like the gentleman from Georgia to take a part of his time as debate proceeds.

Mr. CRISP. How much time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER. Forty-five minutes upon either side.

Mr. BARRETT. I understand, under the rules and practice of this House, that the mover of a resolution is entitled to close debate.

Mr. CRISP. When we have a running debate of five or ten minutes it is usual to alternate, but still the gentleman has forty-five minutes.

Mr. BARRETT. I have just put in a gentleman on this side of the House.

Mr. CRISP. I desire to move at the proper time that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not make that motion now, because it would cut off debate.

Mr. BARRETT. If the gentleman does not desire debate I shall close and ask for the previous question.

Mr. CRISP. That is altogether with the House whether they will do this side injustice or not. The gentleman may demand it, but I assure him now, as a new member, that side will not sustain it.

Mr. BARRETT. The debate began with a few remarks by myself, followed by the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], followed by the remarks of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and I submit to the House whether it is not now the turn of the other side.

Mr. CRISP. But does not the gentleman see that he has forty-five minutes remaining on his side, while we have forty-five minutes on this side, and that therefore it is reasonable that he should use some of his remaining time and let us follow him; he, of course, having the right to conclude the debate, which nobody seeks to take away from him?

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in order to show that courtesy which is due at least from a new member to one who has had such long and distinguished service in this House as the gentleman from Georgia, and who certainly ought to be much better versed than myself in the rules and the practice of the House, I now yield ten minutes of my remaining time to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], in the remarks which he has made, has entirely avoided the real point at issue under this resolution. It is not a question as to whether protection or free trade is the appropriate policy of this country. It is not a question whether any citizen of this country, or even any official, upon any stump or any platform in this country, has the right to advocate either side of that issue. The question is whether our ambassador to the Court of St. James, not an ambassador from the Democratic party, not an ambassador from the Republican party, not an ambassador from the Populist party, but the ambassador of the whole people of the United States, charged with the duty of representing the whole people in those matters which relate to the nationality of this country, should, while holding that position and on foreign soil, so far forget the position which he holds, so far forget that he is a representative of the whole United States, as to denounce one-half of the people of this country as men who are in favor of a policy which breeds corruption and leads to selfishness.

Now, I ask the gentleman from Georgia if he, as a fair-minded man, would regard it as appropriate for an ambassador of the United States who chanced in his party relations at home to be a Republican to go upon a platform in a foreign country, while he was holding the position of our ambassador, and make a speech declaring that those of our people who favored free trade, or opposed the policy of protection in this country, were in favor of a system which produced corruption, in favor of a system which destroyed business, and resulted in the complete enervation of the American people? Suppose the case were reversed, I ask the gentleman from Georgia if he would regard an ambassador representing the whole American people as acting properly if he turned aside from his duties as the representative of the whole American people to make such a speech?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, in reply I say to my friend from Maine that I regard this utterance of the American ambassador not as the discussion of a question of municipal policy in the United States, but rather as the discussion of a world-wide policy, a question which is discussed in every university in the world. The question of protection or free trade is not a municipal question confined to any one country.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that my friend from Georgia should thus avoid the issue here, because it is one that may become very practical with reference to the conduct of our ambassadors abroad in the future. Mr. Bayard was discussing protection as a policy in this country, and nowhere else. I ask the gentleman from Georgia again: Suppose the ambassador of the United States, Mr. Bayard, should, during this coming week, appear on a platform in the city of London and denounce gentlemen in this country who advocate the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 as men who are in favor of destroying the business of the country, as men who practice corruption, would the gentleman regard that as a performance appropriate to the functions of an American minister abroad? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman assumes that I either approve or criticise the conduct or the language of an ambassador, according as I may approve or disapprove of the propositions which he lays down. Surely the gentleman must see that that is hardly fair.

Mr. DINGLEY. But was not the whole tenor of the argument of the gentleman from Georgia to sustain the ambassador in the speech that he made in Edinburgh, denouncing an economic policy which at least half the people of the United States approve, and which had been the continuous policy of this country for thirty-two years?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman forgets that the question which our ambassador there raised is an academic question, which is discussed everywhere thoughout the world, and why should the gentleman from Delaware who has gone as our ambassador to Great Britain surrender the ideas which he has long entertained as to the wisdom of lower tariff rates?

Mr. DINGLEY. But should Mr. Bayard, occupying the position of an ambassador of the United States in a foreign country, discuss that question from a partisan standpoint, upon a foreign platform, and denounce as corruptionists the people in this country who are in favor of a certain policy?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think the gentleman's criticism is just at all. The ambassador was talking about a general question of fiscal policy. As to the question of what it is proper for an ambassador to do or not to do, to say or not to say, not on a public but on an official occasion, I do not pretend to decide. If the gentleman asks me as an individual whether I think the ambassador was right in what he said on that subject, of course I would approve it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this is a question of much importance with reference to the conduct of our ambassadors abroad. And I should feel just as much disposed to insist upon the criticism which I have made with reference to a foreign ambassador if he had made a speech exactly the reverse of this. If any minister of the United States, being a Republican, had, upon a platform in Great Britain or elsewhere, made a speech denouncing as corruptionists and enemies of the country those in this country who favored free trade and opposed protection, I should have said that such an ambassador should be recalled immediately after making such a speech. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to the language recited in this resolution. Let us see what is an "academic question."

In his own country—

Said Ambassador Bayard, representing the whole people of this country and not simply one party or one faction of the people—in his own country he had witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of State socialism called protection, which he believed had done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the popular mind, etc.

Now, I want to know whether the gentleman from Georgia regards such an utterance as this by an ambassador of the whole people of the United States, on a foreign platform, as a mere discussion of an "academic question?"

Mr. CRISP. Is not the statement as quoted a statement that this protective policy tends to breed corruption?

Mr. BOUTELLE. "In his own country."

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I want to know if the gentleman from Georgia believes that an ambassador of all the people of the United States has a right to go upon a foreign platform and thus denounce one-half or more of the people of this country? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CRISP. I give the gentleman my own opinion. I am not a diplomat. I do not know anything about international law. But it seems to me that any citizen of the United States, no matter in what capacity he may be acting, has the right, when the discussion of an economic policy arises, to give his honest conviction as to the tendencies and results of its practice in his own country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Speaking on a foreign platform, has an ambassador of the whole people of the United States the right to denounce a policy of the Government which he represents, and especially denounce the citizens who sustain that policy—more than one-half of the people—denounce that policy as one that corrupts public life?

Mr. CRISP. He should always tell the truth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say I am surprised at the views expressed by the gentleman from Georgia—not his views as to the point in dispute between the friends of protection and the friends of free trade, for no one on this side is discussing that now—but his views with reference to the correct conduct of a minister of the United States in a foreign country before a foreign audience.

If, as I have already said, the minister of this country to England had gone upon a platform in London and denounced the people in this country who favored the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 as corruptionists, as men seeking to destroy the interests of this country, I am sure that the indignation of the gentleman from Georgia would have been at once aroused, and he would have seen the impropriety of such conduct on the part of an ambassador of the whole people. But the impropriety would have been no more patent in that case than in this. And I think it exceedingly important at this point that no considerable body of the American people should undertake to defend any ambassador of the United States, whatever the party to which he may be attached at home, who goes abroad and, while holding that official position and discharging the duties of ambassador for the whole people of the United States, denounces, upon a foreign platform before a foreign audience, a policy which prevailed in this country from 1861 to 1893, supported by a vast majority of the American people. And I would condemn the ambassador who should go upon a foreign platform while holding that position and denounce those who take a contrary view. I think that the good judgment of the gentleman from Georgia must convince him that any such conduct as this by an ambassador of the whole people of the United States is injurious to the interests of this country and presents an example which should not be sustained by any considerable body of the American people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. If I can have the time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired; but some other gentleman can take the floor and yield to allow the question to be asked.

Mr. BARRETT. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. CRISP. Now, will the gentleman kindly yield for a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will.

Mr. CRISP. I answered at least with candor the question of the gentleman, and I shall expect as much from him. I ask him whether he believes, as a Representative, that the language recited by the gentleman from Massachusetts in his resolution furnishes good ground for the impeachment of Mr. Bayard?

Mr. DINGLEY Although I am not discussing that question, yet may say, if I an answer is desired, that in my judgment this is a case in which perhaps impeachment may not be the most expedient remedy. But that this House, representing the American people, should condemn such action on the part of their ambassador abroad I have no doubt. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Will my friend let me say in this connection that the gentleman from Massachusetts obtained the right to discuss this question in this House solely on the ground that the language recited constituted ground of impeachment? Without such an allegation or averment the gentleman could not have been enabled to make his speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not responsible for the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has exercised his own judgment in the premises.

Mr. CRISP. Then, as I understand, the allegation that this is an impeachable offense—an offense for which Mr. Bayard should be impeached—does not meet the approval of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, I want to ask the gentleman, as long as he has asked me the question——

Mr. CRISP. Am I correct about that?

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether——

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman is pursuing the Irish method—answering my question by asking another.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I have answered the question of the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Was I correct in assuming that the gentleman from Maine did not concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts in holding that this language, if correctly reported, furnishes ground for impeachment?

Mr. DINGLEY. My judgment is that such language, denouncing the people of this country, uttered in a foreign country by an ambassador of the United States, is an impeachable offense if the House desires to thus proceed. [Applause on the Republican side.] Whether it is wise to do so is another question.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, well——

Mr. DINGLEY (continuing). I have no doubt an impeachable offense has been committed, if the House desires to apply this remedy, and in any event one which should receive the reprobation and condemnation of this body. If the ambassadors of the United States are to violate the proprieties of their official position in this manner, the time has certainly come when it is the duty of Congress to make an example of the guilty parties, and even by process of impeachment, if nothing else will answer, although in this case I prefer another remedy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in conclusion, that I regret that any question of this kind should take any partisan turn whatever. As I have said, it is not a question between the advocates of protection and free trade, but the question is as to the propriety of the conduct of an ambassador of the whole people of the United States in a foreign country. I can not believe that there is a single gentleman on the other side of the House, certainly not the gentleman from Georgia, who would countenance as a principle an ambassador of the United States in going on a foreign stump or a foreign platform and denouncing a policy which is sustained by at least one-half of the people of this country and condemning the citizens of his country as corruptionists.

I think some example should be made of a United States ambassador who persistently violates the proprieties of official life. In my judgment the members of the House should unhesitatingly condemn such a course, even, if necessary, to the extent of asking the President of the United States to recall the ambassador who thus violates the proprieties of official life. I say this, too, without regard to the party of which this gentleman or any other gentleman occupying a similar position may be a member.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no time at my disposal to answer it.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to ask the gentleman if he recollects whether Mr. Schenck, our minister abroad at one time, was impeached——

Mr. BARRETT. Does this come out of my time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] took the floor to ask a question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield him time?

Mr. CRISP. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman said the Republican party would impeach a Republican ambassador under such circumstances. Did they impeach Mr. Schenck when he was guilty of the offense of cheating the English in mining business?

Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend from Alabama is mistaken; it was cheating at poker. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I can not say whether this resolution is brought in here under a false pretense or not; but I congratulate myself upon knowing that it is brought into the House based upon a newspaper report of a speech. It is introduced by an editor of a newspaper, the Boston Advertiser. His action is backed by a former editor of the same newspaper. The editor of the Lewiston Journal has also given a favorable expression to the resolution. Mr. Speaker, it seems eminently fitting that a newspaper writer on this side of the House should have something to say on the subject, and I congratulate the correspondents in the gallery that the press is at least speaking for itself on the floor of the House.

I have no particular love for the ambassador of the United States to Great Britain. I have not forgotten that he has not done what he should have done toward securing the release of Irish patriots, citizens of the United States, who I believe are incarcerated unjustly in English prisons to-day.

I have not forgotten that he is a welcome guest in the houses of the Conservative aristocracy there, and that he never appears at banquets given by the friends of home rule in Ireland. But, Mr. Speaker, he should be treated with justice even by his political opponents upon this floor. If I read his remarks, or his alleged remarks, correctly, they resemble remarks that I have heard read frequently in public documents upon this floor. He is only reiterating what has been proclaimed by the President of the United States in messages and letters read in Congress. The ambassador to Great Britain ought not to be impeached for repeating the sentiments and ideas promulgated by the President of the United States. If this resolution is not brought in here under false pretenses, why does not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] supplant it with a resolution impeaching the President? [Manifestations of derision on the Republican side.]

Go to the fountain head, gentlemen, if you mean what you say. You have been taking similar medicine for nearly eight years from the President of the United States, and not a whimper have we heard of impeachment; yet the instant that an officer of the Government reasserts the sentiments enunciated by the President of the United States in his messages or papers, forthwith there is a great hue and cry for impeachment.

But there is really nothing in this demand, Mr. Speaker. It is only the opening of the tariff debate for the present session of Congress. You are getting in early, my friends. You will have plenty of time later on. If the tariff is to be revised there will be plenty of time for debate, and all the young Congressmen will undoubtedly have an opportunity to participate. I am glad that the rules of the Fifty-first Congress were temporarily adopted by this House. You are working under these rules. They limit this debate here to two hours. Why anticipate the fight? I have taken more than my share of the two hours. I thank the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] for his courtesy. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, when this Congress assembled it was confronted with grave and important responsibilities. The people had great expectations. They hoped that there would be legislation to ameliorate existing difficulties. They expected that the great majority on the Republican side would give to the country legislation that would benefit the people and improve business. We have now been here one week. The committees have not been announced. The regular organization for business has not been completed, and yet the first step that the Republicans take toward ameliorating the condition of affairs in this country is to bring in a resolution looking to impeachment of an American ambassador on grounds which I am satisfied they regard as insufficient. I take it that no one here doubts the object of the resolution. It is simply that a few gentlemen on the Republican side may air their rhetoric and present to the country their views on a protective tariff. If the Republicans desire to legislate on the tariff question, they should be bold enough to bring in a bill and meet that great question as it should be met.

The people of the United States are watching this Congress with great interest, and, remembering the pledges which have been made, they expect beneficial legislation. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] desires to benefit this country, let him proceed in some more proper way than to attack our American ambassador, Mr. Bayard, on newspaper reports that are not known to be authentic. That distinguished gentleman needs no defense by me. His record in the Senate of the United States, his record as Secretary of State, speaks more strongly than anything I can say in behalf of his statesmanship, his ability, and his patriotism. This resolution is simply an excuse, a miserable excuse, brought in here that a debate may be started on a subject that the Republicans seem to be afraid to bring up in a regular way.

I do not believe that there is anything in the words which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] has taken from newspapers to authorize impeachment or to justify him in the assault which he has made on a distinguished and worthy officer. Mr. Bayard has said nothing more in the paragraph quoted than the President of the United States has substantially said in his messages. He has said nothing more than has been repeatedly said by members of this House, and he has spoken plain and unvarnished truth. When Mr. Bayard made a speech on the subject of "Individual freedom the germ of national progress and permanence," he was simply doing that which he had a right to do, and I fail to find in anything set forth in the preamble or resolutions proper grounds for impeachment. I do not believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House regard the language recited as sufficient to authorize impeachment.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me a question? Does not my friend distinguish any difference between a message coming from the President of the United States, whose duty or privilege it is, at least, to send a message to this House stating his opinion, or a statement made by a member of this House, where politics are discussed, and a statement made in a foreign country by an American ambassador in regard to his own countrymen?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I am accustomed, Mr. Speaker, to the interruptions of my friend from Maine. I believe they always occur. I do make a distinction between a President's message or the speeches made on this floor and the utterances of a foreign ambassador.

But I say that there is nothing in the reported utterances of Ambassador Bayard set forth in the preamble and resolution which justifies impeachment, and they were used as a flimsy pretext to precipitate a debate on protection and injure a faithful and worthy ambassador.

Mr. MILLIKEN. What can a fellow say to disgrace his country if he has not said it there? [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. When the gentleman refers to Mr. Bayard in that manner he shows his failure to appreciate the ability and statesmanship of that distinguished gentleman. I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. Speaker, if we had the complete speech delivered by Mr. Bayard before the Edinburgh Philosophic Institution I have no doubt it would be regarded by impartial and unprejudiced persons as a clean and able argument against protection and in favor of individual freedom and directly in accordance with the sentiments of the President who appointed him, and in line with the views of a majority of the people of that country which the able ambassador of the United States represented at the Court of Great Britain.

I know of no reason, political, social, or diplomatic, to prevent our ambassadors or ministers from upholding and supporting the sentiments or views of the President of the United States or a majority of his countrymen.

Mr. BARRETT. I made the statement in my opening remarks that the statements made by Mr. Bayard were in no sense warranted by but were in distinct defiance of the rules and regulations issued for his conduct by the Department of State. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who served in the diplomatic service, as to whether or not my statement is based on the truth, and I yield to him any time he desires to make a statement.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the instructions that are issued by the State Department to the diplomatic representatives of the United States are partly oral, by the Secretary usually, and partly in a special paper which has been and I believe still is considered confidential: and I would not feel at liberty to read here a paper which was put in my hands as a confidential paper when I undertook such service; but as I subsequently, as Assistant Secretary, sometimes gave the instructions, by the Secretary's direction, to officers departing for diplomatic posts, I may say that the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts is substantially correct—that all diplomatic representatives who went out were specially enjoined to use the greatest caution in their public utterances, to touch upon no burning or political question in the country to which they were accredited or elsewhere. There is a public document on the subject which answers the gentleman's question with more precision. In the regulations and instructions issued by authority of the President of the United States for the government of all our consular officers throughout the world occur these words:

> They will not give publicity through the press or otherwise to opinions injurious to the public institutions of the country or the persons concerned in their administration.

They—

> Are not allowed to allude in public speeches to any matters in dispute between the United States and any other government; * * * it is a still better rule to avoid public speeches when it can be done without exciting feeling in the community in which the officer resides. They will be particularly careful to refrain from unfavorable comment or criticism upon the institutions or acts of the Government to which they are accredited.

That is sent out as an order and it has this preliminary note:

> The following revised regulations and instructions * * * are hereby prescribed.

That is signed by President Cleveland and accompanied by an order of the Secretary of State, similar in tenor, closing with this strict injunction upon every officer:

> They are to be carefully observed in all respects.
> I am, sir, your obedient servant, T. F. BAYARD.

At the time I was connected with the State Department the Consular Regulations were revised and these paragraphs were put in charge of an experienced and skillful officer, Mr. Wood, to revise. He did so, and brought them to me for approval. In the discussion between us it was stated that they might be enlarged to cover all domestic questions or politics and forbid their discussion. But Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, said, "No; such instructions are unnecessary. We never have had, and never will have, an officer who will go abroad and talk about our affairs at home." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY].

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in the discussion of this resolution the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentlemen on the other side have not acted ingenuously in this assault upon the American ambassador at the Court of St. James in reference to the language which they have quoted as used by Mr. Bayard in the public press. They have asserted here, and it will go to the country in the RECORD and through the public press, that Mr. Bayard used language concerning his compatriots in America that was disparaging to them, and that seems to be the gravamen of the complaint.

I call the attention of this House to the fact that Mr. Bayard in no single instance, or in a word that he used in this speech, in any way has assailed the character of his fellow-citizens of America. He never said that you gentlemen who favor protection were corruptionists. I can debate the question of protection with my friend and my neighbor here, and I can say to him as Mr. Bayard said upon the platform in Great Britain, that the tendency of the policy of protection is to corruption; but I will have at the same time the highest respect for the character of the men with whom I differ. Mr. Bayard could, with perfect respect to the American people, make the statement to that effect in what my distinguished friend here calls an academic discussion, that the tendency of this policy and principle was toward corruption.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asked my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] a while ago what he would have said if Mr. Bayard, our ambassador, had denounced or should denounce the advocates of free silver as corruptionists, whether he would have approved of such a course on the part of our ambassador. Why, Mr. Speaker, even that would not be any ground on which to lodge an impeachment. I would not impeach an ambassador who used that language. I would simply be in favor of locking him up in a private bedlam until he should have a lucid interval. [Laughter.] That would be sufficient punishment for a man who denounced the advocates of the free coinage of silver as corruptionists.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, admitting, which I do not, that the language used by Mr. Bayard about the doctrine of protection was improperly used, there is still no ground for impeachment. An impeachment is a prosecution. Do gentlemen know of any law that authorizes them to prosecute a man for high crimes and misdemeanors upon any such ground as is allaged in this resolution? Where do you find the language used legally defined as a crime or misdemeanor? You say that the language is improper; that it is language open to objection. Well, is that anywhere defined as a crime or a misdemeanor? Can you impeach a man simply for using what you say is improper language?

Mr. Speaker, the distinguished American citizen who is to-day representing this country in Great Britain has seen fit in a public speech there to use language that may not meet the approval of the American Congress; but if it should not be approved by the majority of this House, it seems to me that the proper course would be to frame a resolution of censure and express your opinion on the subject, if that is what you desire to do; and I can not believe that there is a lawyer on that side of the House who thinks that an impeachment will lie upon the ground which is here alleged. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution should be referred to the appropriate committee, the Committee on the Judiciary, that they may coolly and calmly examine the facts of the case and report them back to this House for its sober action.

There is no necessity for a football rush in a matter of this importance. We can very well defer it to a later day, until both sides of the House shall have had an opportunity to examine the circumstances attending the utterance of the language which is here cited against Mr. Bayard. Until we deal with the question in that way we shall not have acted either fairly or ingenuously by a gentleman who has, in the highest degree, represented abroad the character, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, we reserve the remainder of our time until we hear further from gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the defense made of our ambassador to England by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] it seemed to me at first that he was going to say that the language attributed to the ambassador was found in a mere newspaper article—not disavowed, it is true, by Mr. Bayard or his friends, but yet not verified by him—and that it might be well to wait and see whether he would not repudiate it. The gentleman from Georgia, however, left no doubt of its authenticity, for he accepted and defended it. I regretted that, because I do not believe that the gentleman from Georgia in his heart is proud of that utterance or that in his mind he approves of it. I listened also, with some amusement, to the apology made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] for the sentences uttered by our ambassador to England. His apology was that this was not near so bad as some other things that the ambassador had done while he was over there. [Laughter.]

As to this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I think it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, not to the Committee on the Judiciary. If it shall be ascertained beyond doubt that our ambassador did make that speech at Edinburgh, as alleged in the newspapers, I do not believe that there can be found a man upon the other side of the House who will place himself upon his honor and say that he indorses that language or that conduct, and I am quite sure that throughout the country there can not be found a corporal's guard to indorse it. But gentlemen say that the ambassador ought not to be impeached. Well, so far as my opinion is concerned, I doubt if he ought to be impeached as a matter of policy, perhaps not even as a matter of right; but if he made these utterances, then, unless the President of the United States promptly recalls him, I do believe that it is the duty of the American House of Representatives, in an orderly manner, to express, by way of censure, its disapproval of such action and such utterances. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Speaker, without pausing in the brief time allowed me to comment on the apparent motive of this resolution, or the perversion of so small an incident to precipitate the tariff war, I desire to say, what perhaps has not yet been said by any gentleman who has taken part in this discussion, that I believe that the utterance imputed to the American ambassador while speaking at Edinburgh hardly constituted even an impropriety.

The gentleman from Massachusetts called on my veteran friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT], who is an experienced diplomat, having had long connection, both at home and abroad, with our foreign affairs, to produce the regulations of the State Department restricting our ambassadors and foreign ministers in the expression of their sentiments. But the gentleman last named, with all his experience, both in the State Department and in our diplomatic service, could find only restrictive admonitions as to political utterances by our foreign representatives upon the local affairs of the countries to which they are accredited. The citation contained nothing in the way of an instruction to our foreign representatives as to what their conduct should be in regard to existing policies in their own country.

Mr. Speaker, this question of so-called protection is not simply a local issue, nor is it a mere "academic question," as my colleague from Georgia has said. It relates to a policy that runs round the world. It is a part of the common law of humanity. It is a burning question in all our international relations. We have not a representative abroad whose business it is not to discuss and negotiate upon matters affecting protection. Our consuls month by month make their reports, in which they discuss every phase of protection. Our representatives of the higher degree, our ambassadors and ministers at foreign courts, are required by their duty to their country under existing laws to negotiate reciprocal trade relations, and they are certainly at liberty to give their views on the effect and consequences of a policy of commercial restriction and suppression. The largest part of their public duty at this time is to secure the abandonment or mitigation of protective burdens inflicted on our trade.

What, then, becomes of this proposed impeachment of our distinguished minister at London? There is no foundation for it in diplomacy, in politics, or in morals. A man, whether he represents this country in one place or another, is not stripped of his true sentiments, and has a right to speak them respectfully wherever the sun shines if he is in accord with the policy of his own country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people of Great Britain are not ignorant of the political revolutions that take place in this country. They are aware of the policies of the Administration which our ambassadors are supposed to represent. As they represent the successful party at home, their views upon these policies certainly ought to give no offense at home if they give none abroad. But in any view Mr. Bayard was in Scotland by invitation, and in a philosophical and scholarly way discussed the principle and practical effects of protection. And if gentlemen on the other side of the House are afraid to have that principle discussed with the utmost freedom and latitude in any tribunal where scholars contend, then they would put an embargo on the progressive development of the truth! Here is a good example of the madness of protection! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARRETT. I yield five minutes of my remaining time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, after the very vigorous onslaught which the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has made upon our ambassador to England, in which, for the purpose of discrediting the original accusation here, he has seen fit to impeach the veracity of his chosen profession, and has then gone on to supplement the accusation with a recital of other wrongs committed by the ambassador, I hardly feel it necessary that anything further should be submitted on this side of the Chamber.

Passing, however, from the remarks of the gentleman from New York to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who seems to be the recognized leader on the other side of this Chamber, I trust I may be permitted to say that during the entire time he was speaking I could not but reflect how difficult it is in debate for a man of really great ability to invest a wrong with the appearance of a right.

Now, I am not concerned, as is the gentleman from Georgia, and as is the gentleman from Kentucky, with the question as to the motives of the gentleman from Massachusetts in bringing this question of privilege before the House. I care not whether he did it for the purpose of getting an opportunity by discussion to express his indignation at the conduct of our ambassador, or whether he did it for the bona fide purpose of pressing the matter further and procuring an impeachment of the ambassador. Doubtless if he did it from the first motive, it was because of the refusal of the gentleman from Georgia to permit the consideration of the resolution offered by the other gentleman from Massachusetts, and which made it necessary that some kind of parliamentary device should be resorted to if gentlemen on this floor were to have an opportunity to express their disapproval of the conduct of the ambassador to England.

But the trouble with the gentleman from Georgia is that he has shot wide of the mark; that he seems, as do other gentlemen on that side of the House, to have misapprehended the real point at issue in this matter. The question, sir, is not whether protection is right or whether protection is wrong. The question is not whether the tenets of free trade will best advance the interests of our country or whether they will injure its interests. Nor is the issue whether or not those questions which the gentleman from Georgia has been pleased to call "academic" shall be discussed in the proper forum in this country. Nor is it even a question as to whether a private citizen of this country, being upon a foreign soil, has the right to express his unfavorable opinion either of the policy or the morals of his fellow-Americans at home. But the question is whether a man who is the chosen representative of the people of this country, who bears in his hand the insignia of office, shall on a public occasion, on the soil of the Government to which he is accredited, in the presence of foreigners, not merely speak disparagingly of the tenets of a political party in his country, but also make such a personal application of his remarks to his countrymen as shall impeach their integrity and their honesty.

This, sir, is the question before the House, and the gentleman need not attempt to distract attention from this vital question by undertaking to impute to gentlemen on this side of the Chamber simply a disposition to lug in a debate upon the subject of the tariff.

Mr. Speaker, I undertake to say that whenever an ambassador to a foreign country puts his foot upon a transatlantic steamer to go to his destination to represent us, from that moment he should be a sealed book as to the internal dissensions or diverse views of his countrymen.

From that moment he should see everything, to quote the language of Webster which has just been read upon this floor, solely with American eyes, and he should stand as a representative not of any particular polity or of any particular party of his countrymen, but as the guardian and conservator of all the American people North and South, East and West; I undertake, too, sir, to say that for a foreign ambassador from any country to open his mouth upon the soil of the country to which he is accredited, either in disparagement of its institutions or in the disparagement of the institutions of his own countrymen is a gross impropriety, a breach not simply of official etiquette, but a wrong which should justly call down upon him the impartial censure of all his patriotic countrymen.

Now, as I have said, the gentleman from Georgia has evaded that whole question at issue on this question of privilege, and has seen fit to talk about the result of the election and to discuss the merits of the question of protection or free trade, which are in nowise involved on this occasion. I do not wonder that the gentleman has seen fit to announce to this House that he is not a diplomat. The very awkward manner in which he sought to evade the pertinent question put to him by my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], is of itself a strong confirmation of his declaration, and shows that his opinion of himself is well entertained. He will never again be called upon to make that declaration upon this floor after the experience of to-day, for the House will at once assent hereafter to the truth of his proposition that he knows nothing of diplomacy. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

When the gentleman cites the result of the election of 1892 as proof that Mr. Bayard reflected the views of his countrymen in the language employed by him abroad, which language, I insist, he had no right to make use of in that tribunal, the gentleman is unfortunate and overlooks the fact that the last expression of public opinion at the polls is the one to which most importance should be attached. The gentleman forgets that the voice of the American people ever since they committed the fatal error of putting the Democratic party in power has been in the line of reversing their decision, and that in sackcloth and ashes, regretting their conduct, from the time Mr. Cleveland assumed his office up to the present hour, they never have had an opportunity to reverse their decision at the polls that they have not hastened to do it with patriotism and with alacrity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia need not concern himself with what shall be the policy of the Republican party upon this floor. He need not undertake to challenge us to bring in a tariff bill, and to thus raise the issue and go to the country. He may rely upon it that the Republican majority upon this floor will not present to the country the scene of imbecility and dissension which his own party exhibited in the last two Congresses. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The gentleman will observe before this Congress terminates that the Republicans on this floor have both the capacity and the patriotism to reconcile their individual differences, if any exist, in caucus, and to present a solid front upon some line of legislation which they believe will conduce to the interests of all the people of the country. The gentleman will have occasion, too, I trust, before the session expires, to observe that the Republican party will not follow the example of the gentlemen upon the other side; that no Republican dirty linen is to be washed in the presence of this House and of an indignant and disgusted country, in imitation of the course which has subjected the Democracy to the animadversion of the people of all parties, and of the press, irrespective of its party predilections.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary that I should detain the House further upon this subject. The public press of this country has been heard upon the subject of Mr. Bayard's utterances. Right-minded men, patriotic men, who have regard for the proprieties of official life and for the dignity of the nation have been heard to express their opinion upon this subject. It would be a burning shame which would bring deserved reproach, sir, upon this body, if, with all its powers and prerogatives, it passed by this indiscreet, this indelicate, this ill-timed, this untruthful declaration of our ambassador to England without expressing in some form or other its disapproval of his utterances and its condemnation of the motives which led him to make them. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time is remaining to this side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has twenty-five minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE].

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me most unfortunate that this bitter partisan discussion should have proceeded on so flimsy a foundation this morning. This discussion has been precipitated, I fear, not so much with a view to serving the interests of the country at large, as, in a small way, to serve the interests of the Republican party. It seems to me that the time-honored course in such matters might much better have been followed, in view of the fact that there is no man on this floor and probably no man in this country who can say to-day that Thomas F. Bayard ever uttered the language imputed to him and which we have been discussing this morning. It might better have been sent to a committee without debate, and let that committee ascertain, first, whether or not there was any foundation whatever for the assertion that these statements, in the form that we have heard them on the floor of this House to-day, were properly to be attributed to Mr. Bayard, or were ever made by him, and secondly, whether or not, if they were uttered by him, impeachment would be a proper proceeding in the premises.

This debate, sir, has been precipitated on the theory that this is an impeachment proceeding, and therefore privileged. It could not have proceeded upon any other theory; and, I ask, how absurd, how unfortunately ridiculous, would be the position of this House, in its occupation of almost an entire day in the discussion of this matter, if it should transpire upon investigation that the two or three words which give the objectionable character to the statement attributed to Mr. Bayard were not uttered by him at all.

I do not care to discuss the effect of the use of such language by our ambassador abroad, if it was used by him, for that has been ably and sufficiently discussed by ex-Speaker CRISP, Judge TURNER, and other gentlemen who have preceded me.

What foundation have we for all this furious criticism of Mr. Bayard? Simply a newspaper statement coming to us third or fourth hand. A Representative informs us, probably on the authority of some American newspaper, that an English newspaper has said, upon the authority of a reporter, whose information may have been either direct or indirect, that Mr. Bayard used the language objected to. Yet we proceed to discuss the matter as if we were in full possession of the facts and in a position to vote on the question of impeachment. Now, sir, it is quite as likely that the young man who reported the matter for the London News or the man who telegraphed a synopsis of it to the American press inserted the objectionable words as that Mr. Bayard used them.

It ill becomes the dignity of this House to proceed with the discussion of alleged misconduct on the part of a national representative of this country without the slightest satisfactory knowledge of what he has done. In my opinion the precipitation of this debate, on the theory that it is an impeachment proceeding—a proceeding that ought to be based on knowledge, that ought to be supported by immediate proofs—presents a most unfortunate condition of affairs; and the House can not too speedily refer the whole matter to the Judiciary Committee, without further discussion of the merits, to ascertain the facts and the law upon which alone the House should act, so that the matter may hereafter be intelligently discussed, upon full information as to all of the facts. We are certainly in no position to discuss the case upon its merits at this time.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to reserve the remainder of my time, and shall, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, move the previous question.

Mr. CRISP. I move to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Massachusetts has indicated a desire to demand the previous question, and the Chair thinks that would be the first question in order.

Mr. CRISP. But I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, in my own right, either for discussion or to make any motion which is pertinent to this question. I could move to adjourn; I could call the previous question at this time. I have the rule before me:

When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question; which motions shall be decided without debate.

Now, neither of these motions has been made. The gentleman from Massachusetts gives notice that when he gets the floor he intends to make that motion; but I have the floor in my own right for any purpose, and I repeat I could demand the previous question myself, or move that the House adjourn, or make any other pertinent motion.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Georgia knows it is customary to recognize first the gentleman in charge of a measure.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly, Mr. Speaker; that would be the case if I were speaking in his time; but I have the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks we can easily reach an understanding in reference to this matter.

Mr. CRISP. It is not capable of a misunderstanding. I simply wish to preserve my right to make the motion I have indicated, which is a proper motion under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts indicated that he reserved his time and yielded to the gentleman from Georgia for the purpose of making remarks.

Mr. CRISP. But "the gentleman from Georgia" thinks the Chair is entirely mistaken. "The gentleman from Georgia" has twenty minutes in his own right. The Chair announced a few moments since that I had twenty-five minutes, of which I yielded five minutes to the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Georgia insists the Chair will put the question on his motion.

Mr. CRISP. "If the gentleman from Georgia insists!" Why of course he insists. When a proposition like this comes in under the guise of an impeachment, but presented for the purpose of precipitating a political discussion, certainly I insist.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the gentleman from Georgia the floor in a manner which gives him a right to move the previous question?

Mr. CRISP. I do not want to move the previous question, nor have I any desire to cut the gentleman from Massachusetts off. I only want to reserve my rights in this matter.

Mr. BARRETT. I think I can settle this matter if the gentleman from Georgia will allow me a moment.

Mr. CRISP. I only want to have my motion pending, so that it can be voted upon by the House.

Mr. BARRETT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. CRISP. If the gentleman insists upon it I will——

Mr. BARRETT. I understand the rules of the House provide that after the previous question is ordered a motion to recommit will be in order and can be entertained. If the gentleman desires to do that after the previous question is ordered I shall favor it.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman desires to make the motion in his own right as a matter of right under the rules.

When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, or for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), a motion to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

Now, I had no intention whatever to cut off the gentleman's right of debate, but I wanted a motion to refer pending, so that after the previous question had been ordered my motion could be entertained.

Mr. BARRETT. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts agrees to that.

Mr. BARRETT. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman if he desires further time for debate; if not, I shall ask for the adoption of the previous question, subject to the motion to recommit.

Mr. CRISP. I wish to say just a few words in conclusion. Here is a proposition presented to the House which has never been considered by a committee, of which no one on this side had notice, and of which perhaps few on that side had notice. It is a proposition reciting certain things alleged to have been said by the American ambassador at the Court of St. James, and instructs a committee of the House to proceed to consider and investigate that question and report by impeachment or otherwise.

Now, there is no evidence of any statement excepting, I suppose, the allegation of some paper. I have not the resolution before me, but that perhaps is what it recites. I want to call the attention of the older members of the House to the fact that this is an entirely new departure. The practice has been, in a dignified way, when a gentleman calls attention to any matter like this, to refer it to a committee for consideration. Ordinarily this could only be referred through the petition box. If the gentleman from Massachusetts had introduced a resolution to censure Mr. Bayard he would be required to send it to the Speaker for reference to the proper committee; but by simply putting at the head of his resolution "I hereby impeach Mr. Bayard" he obtains the right to debate his resolution as a matter of privilege. Now, I say that, in my judgment, there are not twenty men on that side of the House who honestly believe that if every word alleged to have been said was said by Mr. Bayard he is guilty of an impeachable offense. I venture the assertion that not half a dozen men on that side would dare stand in their places in the House of Representatives and vote to impeach Mr. Bayard if it were true that he used that language.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, under the guise of impeachment, has obtained the right to make a speech upon the floor, ventilating his views upon this question. It remains to be seen whether this House will determine that that is the right sort of practice. The suggestion made by this side of the House works no hardship, works no delay, works no injustice. The majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary will be composed of Republican members. They are the friends of the movant of this resolution; they are the friends of those who are interested in condemning, if you please, the action of the ambassador to Great Britain.

Why not wait, in the orderly course of business, until such action can be had? Why vote for the adoption of this resolution and thus, impliedly at least, express an opinion as to the allegations contained in the preamble and thereby establish a practice which, we may rest assured, will return to torment us before this session shall come to an end? If the House wants to establish a wise practice it will refer this resolution to its Judiciary Committee, and we may depend that such committee will act upon it in accordance with justice and right and truth. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARRETT. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eighteen minutes left.

Mr. BARRETT. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, I have no intention to take part in this discussion. I rise simply to recall an historical incident which I think illustrates the spirit that ought to control the actions and the utterances of a representative of the American people at any foreign port. At the outbreak of the war Mr. Charles Francis Adams represented the United States at the Court of St. James. On one occasion he was in conversation with some English gentlemen high in authority, whose sympathies were on the side of the Confederacy. Up to that time success in the field had crowned the Confederate arms, and one of these English gentlemen, thinking, possibly, to annoy Mr. Adams, said to him: "Mr. Adams, these Confederates seem to fight well." Mr. Adams's reply was: "Yes, sir; they are my countrymen." [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate I wish to extend the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me a moment. I suggest that in the instruction to the committee contained in the latter part of the resolution submitted by him the words "by impeachment" be omitted, so that the committee may report what, after careful investigation, is deemed best. I offer this as a practical suggestion which will give the committee, to be composed, of course, of gentlemen from both sides of the House, the amplest jurisdiction to deal with this question without making any implication in advance as to what their report shall be.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, I will say that the resolution as submitted reads "report by impeachment or otherwise," which, I think, covers practically the point he has suggested; but out of deference to him I gladly consent that the words which he has indicated shall be omitted, leaving the committee full scope to deal with the matter. I ask unanimous consent that that change be made.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will not that take away the privileged character of the resolution? We understood that those were the words on which the privileged character of the resolution was based.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will remember that the resolution begins "I do impeach"——

Mr. CRISP. But that is a mere "whereas."

The SPEAKER (continuing). But, independent of that, the gentleman from Georgia will no doubt agree that after the House has had jurisdiction of a question, it may amend it to suit itself.

Mr. CRISP. The Chair thinks not. [Great laughter.] I mean I think not.

The SPEAKER. I am afraid the gentleman from Georgia has got too much in the habit of replying to me in that language. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRISP. But, Mr. Speaker, if jurisdiction, or, rather, if the right of privilege is acquired by a specific allegation and only by that allegation, and then that allegation is stricken from the resolution, is it not a question whether the proposition is still privileged?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the proposition having once become a question of privilege the House has a right to dispose of it.

Mr. CRISP. But the House has not altered it.

The SPEAKER. The House may refuse to alter it.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman himself proposes to strike out that language.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposes to ask unanimous consent of the House to strike out the words indicated.

Mr. CRISP. Well, I object to that. I want these gentlemen to go on record as voting for impeachment if they wish to.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, is there objection to my request?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] asks unanimous consent that the words "by impeachment or otherwise" be omitted from the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. I object.

Mr. BARRETT. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will see that I am desirous of complying with his request and am only prevented at this time by the objection which has been made.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said by the Democratic members on this floor as to the motives which prompted me to introduce this resolution. I desire to say now, in all fairness, that if, on this day, when the time of the House is open for free discussion, when there are no important questions pressing upon us for consideration, they had allowed the resolution offered by my colleague [Mr. MCCALL] to be considered and debated, my resolution would not have been presented.

But when, by the solitary objection of one member, consideration of this question, which comes very near to the hearts of the American people, was summarily denied, I presented the question of privilege which has absorbed the attention of the House during the last two hours.

I have heard the objection raised, sir, that an impeachment of a civil officer of the United States must be for high crimes and misdemeanors. I wish to call the attention of the House to a book on the Constitution which has been just issued from the pen of that eminent authority, Hon. George S. Boutwell, of Massachusetts, who has been speaker of the house of representatives in that State, governor, member of this House, member of the Senate of the United States, one of the impeachment managers in the case of Andrew Johnson, and Secretary of the Treasury. In this book he says:

> All civil officers of the United States may be removed from office upon impeachment for acts which are neither high crimes nor misdemeanors by common law or the statutes of the United States.

Which means that this House may in its wisdom bring an impeachment proceeding against any civil officer upon any state of facts which it deems of sufficient importance.

I wish to say, however, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a resolution of impeachment. It is a resolution directing the Committee on Foreign Affairs to consider this matter, and to report "by impeachment or otherwise," thus leaving to the committee the judgment as to whether the report shall embody an impeachment and censure, or any other form of reprobation. As to the language, I am not particular. Prompt action on the part of the House is all that is desired. I have asked unanimous consent that the words "by impeachment or otherwise" be stricken out. The other side has objected. An amendment to that effect, later, I shall willingly accept.

I thank the gentlemen on the other side—some of them—who have taken the ground, by implication, that the words embodied in the resolution, if correctly reported, constitute an offense on the part of an ambassador of the United States, and accordingly have taken refuge in the assertion that no such statement was ever made.

I tell them that I quoted this extract myself from the London News. It did not come by telegraph; it was not taken from a paper published in this country. It was written down by my own hand from a copy of the London News in a library in the State of Massachusetts.

I wish to say further, for the benefit of the gentleman from Georgia, who has somewhat questioned the validity of this report, that I am informed, on authority which even he will not question, that this speech, in substance, as I have quoted it here, has been printed in pamphlet form in London, and is there being circulated among the aristocracy and the members of the British Government as the best argument why the standing and reputation of this country need not be seriously considered by them. I would that I had a copy of that pamphlet here. If I had had, I should have quoted from it. But I make the statement that it exists and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs will have no trouble in securing a copy of it.

Another question which has been raised is this: Why not refer this subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, which has often considered resolutions of this sort? I answer that in the main impeachment proceedings in this country have been of such a character that the resolutions have very properly been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. But I also assert that there are cases in which resolutions looking to impeachment proceedings have been referred to other committees than that on the Judiciary. For example, on the 2d day of December, 1884, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was directed by this House to make such an examination as the one to which I have asked attention in the resolution I have submitted.

I trust that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia will be voted down and that this resolution will go through. This is simply an inquiry, and when the facts are made known to this House I expect to welcome that gentleman's able assistance and magnetic voice in passing such a vote through this body as will put on the records of this country the declaration that an ambassador of the United States at a foreign court can not with impunity insult the people whom he represents. [Applause on the Republican side.]

An attempt has been made to drag the tariff into this question. My friend from Georgia has very kindly suggested to me that I restrain my youthful impatience and speak on that subject.

I will say to him that there are many men on this floor who have acquired, by long years of experience and investigation, exact information upon that question. As a young and new member, however, I can assure him that any tariff bill passed by the Republicans of this House will not be followed in less than twelve months by self-confessed national bankruptcy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. The one that your party did pass was followed in that way. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. BARRETT. This issue has nothing to do with the tariff. The gentleman from Georgia knows that very well. Does he attempt to befog the issue? Let us pass on this matter now. We will discuss the tariff later on.

Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that long before this time the President of the United States would either have demanded a satisfactory explanation from Mr. Bayard or else have recalled him and sent an American to represent us at the Court of St. James. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not forget that a few months since, when the representative of a humble Republic, limited to a few little islands in the midst of the Pacific Ocean—a Republic which has sought and desires still further to seek close political connection with this country—when their representative, Mr. Thurston, in a moment of forgetfulness perhaps, accorded to a newspaper man an interview in which he stated some truthful and self-evident propositions concerning the domestic affairs of the land which he represented—propositions supported by the President of his country and his cabinet, which in no way had reference to proceedings in which this Government was involved—our sensitive Department of State, obeying the instructions of the President of the United States, insisted upon and secured the recall of Mr. Thurston because he had made a statement which was absolutely indorsed by the people that he represented.

I propose, if it is possible, to secure the recall of a man who in high public place and in a time of great national exigency has put himself on record in a way to humiliate and disgrace the proudest people of the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I am asked, Mr. Speaker, why this resolution was not withheld until a later date in the session.

I will answer that question.

For many months, sir, the foreign relations of this country have been a matter of the most serious consideration to the people of the United States. For many months on hustings, on platforms, in the lyceum arena, wherever the people have been called together to consider public questions, one of the most burning has been the relations of this country with the other nations of the world. tI was well understood by the people in all parts of the country that delicate questions had arisen in regard to the relations between the United States and the Government of Great Britain.

I remember, sir, ten months ago, the House of Representatives, under the personal management of my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] (I trust that after we get better acquainted he will learn to find in me some elements of pleasant relationship which will justify me in using that term)—I remember that under his personal leadership a resolution was passed directing the President of the United States to proffer to Great Britain our offer of mediation between that Government and our little sister Republic of Venezuela, which Government Great Britain, I do not hesitate to say, is preparing to despoil at this time by the mere force of numbers.

The House directed the President of the United States to offer our mediation between Venezuela and Great Britain in the controversy then and now existing. Five months—five whole months, with the time of passage between New York and London reduced to five days—five months elapsed before the ambassador of the United States, that gentleman who is so full of "academic discussion" [laughter on the Republican side], could find time to present that remonstrance to the British foreign office. Five months more elapsed before the foreign office of Great Britain deigned to give the ambassador of the United States the slightest answer. The President waited and waited, and the message he sent to us at the opening of this session was submitted before any response was made. It is alleged that that response has now come; and a message of the utmost importance concerning the well-being and the dignity of this country is lying on some table, I know not where, waiting until the season of duck shooting in some North Carolina lagoon shall expire. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I hope, sir, and I believe, that the vote of this House, showing its interest in our foreign relations, may be found of sufficient volume and importance to waft it down over Virginia and North Carolina, so that it will at last be heard by that impatient public official who is now, I presume, crouching behind some shield to bring down some timorous and fleeting duck [laughter] and bring him back, so that the long-belated reply to our Venezuelan matter may be submitted to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I declare also that the people of the United States are deeply interested in our peaceable possession of Alaska, which is being seriously questioned. That territory on which our flag should reign dominant is being undermined by stealth on the part of the Dominion of Canada, and her agents already, so the public prints state, are exercising governmental functions upon the soil of this country.

I state as a matter of fact that the modus vivendi in regard to our fishery relations, which has been adopted and followed for several years by Great Britain and this country, has been set aside by Canada without proper notice to us. Our fishermen may soon be without the protection which that modus vivendi implied.

Mr. Speaker, galling as such a position of affairs is—unwilling as I am, as a Representative in this House, to agree for one moment that our representative at the Court of Great Britain should so subject himself to the feeling there that his utterances may be construed at that court as affording ground for its regarding lightly the requests of this Government and holding within its possession for more than five months a formal note submitted by our ambassador before making reply, sending its emissaries upon Alaskan soil to belittle the prestige of the United States—yet considering that a national emergency had arisen, I offered this resolution believing that no time could be inopportune for the representatives of the people of the United States to express their opinions of such an attitude taken at such a time by a high public official. I have thus offered these resolutions.

I do not know whether they will result in impeachment or not. I care not for the form of its report. I am glad to leave them to the distinguished committee soon to be appointed, of which I presume—so far as one may know without authority—my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HITT] will be at the head. I ask from that committee a speedy consideration of the matters submitted, and I ask from this House, even in these early days of the session, an expression which shall be notice to all our diplomatic representatives abroad that, even if they may be in accord with the ideas of the Administration as stated by the gentlemen on the other side, it is not in accord with the opinion of the House of Representatives when they speak in defiance of instructions, in violation of international law, and absolute disregard of the dignity of the people whom they assume to represent.

Let the ambassadors of the United States be instructed that from now on, at least while the composition of the House remains as it is to-day, such utterances, "academic" though they may be, will not be tolerated without a stern rebuke from the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. BARRETT. I understood I had moved the previous question on the main question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think the gentleman will accept the amendment.

Mr. BARRETT. I think perhaps I will.

Mr. CRISP. A motion to refer has priority over a motion to amend.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "by impeachment or otherwise."

Mr. BARRETT. I accept the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I insist that a motion to refer has priority over a motion to amend, under the rules.

To postpone to a day certain, to refer, and to amend.

The several motions have precedence in the foregoing order.

The SPEAKER. The question of reference might first be put. After that the amendment will be pending.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suppose we can vote that motion down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] moves the previous question.

Mr. BARRETT. On the main question and pending amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CRISP) there were—ayes 80, noes 206.

Mr. CRISP. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 209, not voting 54; as follows:

Clarke, Ala.	Hicks,	Ray,
Colson,	Hill,	Reyburn,

So the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary was rejected.

The following pairs were announced:

For this day:

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. MOSES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE with Mr. WASHINGTON.

Mr. LEISENRING with Mr. JONES.

Mr. CHICKERING with Mr. BARTLETT of New York.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE with Mr. SULZER.

Mr. GROSVENOR with Mr. SORG.

Mr. RAY with Mr. FITZGERALD.

Mr. DRAPER with Mr. BOATNER.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. COWEN.

Mr. COUSINS with Mr. CULBERSON.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whereas, in a public speech delivered in Boston, England, on the 2d day of August, 1895, the said Bayard is reported by the press of this country to have said, "The President stands in the midst of a strong, self-confident, and oftentimes violent people, men who desire to have their own way, and who need their way frequently obstructed, and I tell you plainly it takes a real man to govern the people of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "by impeachment or otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. In adopting the resolution the House, I suppose, does not adopt the suggestion of the gentleman that he impeaches the ambassador, but the vote is taken simply on the resolution.

Mr. BARRETT. It is not a question whether the House impeaches. I made that statement on my own authority.

Mr. BAILEY. I simply desire to know if we vote to adopt that together with the resolution.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the Clerk will report the amendment against which the gentleman just voted, for his information—the last amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not vote against the amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman's colleagues did.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "by impeachment or otherwise."

Mr. BAILEY. I perfectly understand that, and voted for it. My inquiry was, if the question is on all the matter submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, including the preamble and impeachment.

The SPEAKER. The resolution itself, if the gentleman from Texas will examine it, will show the other is in the preamble.

Mr. BAILEY. And the vote is simply on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the resolution.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. BARRETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce the appointment of the following members as the Committee on Accounts: Mr. J. F. ALDRICH, of Illinois; Mr. B. B. ODELL, jr., of New York; Mr. J. E. MCCALL, of Tennessee; Mr. J. P. TRACY, of Missouri; Mr. CHESTER I. LONG, of Kansas; Mr. H. W. RUSK, of Maryland, and Mr. ANDREW PRICE, of Louisiana.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. COWEN, for two days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. COFFIN obtained leave to withdraw from the files, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Theresa B. Walbach, Fifty-first Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday at noon.

ADJUSTMENT OF CLAIMS WITH TENNESSEE.

Mr. HARRIS. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas there has been introduced and is now pending before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs Senate joint resolution No. 2, providing for an adjustment of certain claims and counterclaims of the United States against the State of Tennessee and of the State of Tennessee against the United States in respect of certain railroads in Tennessee held and operated by officers of the State and taken from the possession of the State by the United States Army and operated for the use of the Army of the United States, and certain obligations that the State of Tennessee executed to secure the payment of the purchase money for certain railroad material sold by the military authorities of the United States to the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroad Company, the Edgefield and Kentucky Railroad Company, and the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company subsequent to their release by the said military authorities, and

Whereas it is important that all the facts out of which said claims and counterclaims arose should be laid before the said committee charged with the consideration of said Senate joint resolution No. 2: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish copies of all communications, orders, and correspondence touching the seizure of and operation by the United States of the said Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroad Company, the Edgefield and Kentucky Railroad, and the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad, and the Winchester and Alabama Railroad, and especially all copies of the separate inventories or schedules of the property and rolling stock belonging originally to each of said roads required to be made and furnished by section 3 of Executive order of August 8, 1865, from the War Department, addressed to Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas, commanding Military Division of Tennessee, and copies of all credits to which each of said railroads or the State of Tennessee is entitled on account of military transportation and carrying of United States mails, regardless of whether such credits have or have not been applied to the indebtedness of the said roads or the said State, and all other information, evidence, and facts in the possession of the War Department touching the use, occupation, and conversion by the Government of the United States of each of said roads.

Mr. CULLOM. Is the resolution up for consideration?

Mr. HARRIS. I have asked unanimous consent that it be now considered. At the last Congress I introduced a joint resolution and reintroduced it at the present session and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, authorizing the Attorney-General, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury to meet such commissioners as the State of Tennessee may appoint for the purpose of investigating and adjusting the claims and counterclaims of the State against the Government and of the Government against the State. I have no idea myself how the balance stands. This resolution simply asks the War Department to send to the Senate, in order that the matter may go before the Committee on Military Affairs, the facts so far as they appear of record there.

Mr. CULLOM. What I desired to inquire about especially was whether the resolution had been considered by any committee of the Senate or if it was a resolution to go to a committee for consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a resolution asking the War Department for information for the use of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to it, then.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MARKING OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That all public documents and envelopes printed for the use of the Senate shall be marked on the envelope or wrapper in which they are inclosed with the title of the book or document which they contain, so as to avoid the necessity of opening them to ascertain what book or document is contained in the wrapper or envelope.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to call up a resolution proposing an amendment to the rules of the Senate, which is lying on the desk, in order to make some remarks upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DUBOIS on the 5th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the words "All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, except bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors, which shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce," and inserting the following:

"The general appropriation bills shall be referred to committees as follows:

"To the Committee on Appropriations: The bills for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for sundry civil expenses, and for all deficiencies;

"To the Committee on Agriculture: The bill for the Agricultural Department;

"To the Committee on Foreign Relations: The consular and diplomatic bill;

"To the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill for the military establishment, including the Military Academy;

"To the Committee on Naval Affairs: The bill for the naval establishment;

"To the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads: The Post-Office appropriation bill;

"To the Committee on Indian Affairs: The bill for Indians and Indian tribes;

"To the Committee on Commerce: The bill for rivers and harbors;

"To the Committee on Coast Defenses: The fortifications bill;

"To the Committee on the District of Columbia: The bill making appropriations for the District; and

"To the Committee on Pensions: The pension appropriation bills."

Mr. HARRIS. Is the resolution called up for action this morning?

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to submit some remarks upon it.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, if that is the object, of course there is no objection.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, the proposed amendment to the rules governing this body, which is now before the Senate, contains no new or startling proposition. It provides simply for the distribution of the appropriation bills among the various committees of the Senate. It gives to the committee which, on account of its membership and duties, is most interested in a given subject the power to regulate and determine what amount of money shall be appropriated and how it shall be expended in order to satisfy the necessities and demands of the country as to this particular subject. That is all there is of it.

Facts seem to prove, or at any rate it is the almost unanimous opinion of members of the House, that the interests of the country represented by the various committees have been more carefully looked after and promoted since the division of appropriations by that body than before.

Almost every member of this body who has served in the other branch of Congress during the past ten years will favor the proposed change. This is significant and a powerful argument in itself, especially as a large number of the present Senators have been members of the other branch of Congress during this time.

The question of dividing the Appropriations Committee in the House was debated at different times for a number of years before the change was made. Originally the Ways and Means Committee of that body was also the Appropriations Committee. The growth of the country and its multiplied necessities compelled the creation of the Appropriations Committee. The continued growth and necessities compelled the division of the work of the Appropriations Committee among the various committees of the House. This was accomplished finally in 1885.

In reading the debates on the proposed change in the House anyone can see that the opponents of the reform indulged in prophecies which the result of the change have demonstrated were without foundation. Their main objection was that if so many committees had charge of the appropriations, the expenditures of the Government would be extravagantly and needlessly increased. I anticipate that some such argument will now be used by the opponents of the change in the Senate. No such result has followed in the House, and it seems certain that no such result can follow in the Senate. Of course, the expenditures of the Government have increased since the change was made, but this could not be avoided. The population, business, and necessities of the country have grown steadily, and no matter what method we may adopt for the appropriation of moneys to meet this constantly growing demand, the expenditure of money must keep pace with it.

All appropriations of money originate in the House, and it is an indisputable fact that the Senate Appropriations Committee nearly always increases the amount of the appropriations made by the various appropriation committees of the House. I am aware of the fact that special reasons are urged to explain this, and I do not contend that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate is designedly more extravagant than the several appropriations committees of the House. I do say, however, that there is nothing in a comparison between the appropriation bills of the House and of the Senate to warrant the unsupported statement that one committee will be more wise and economical than several committees in the proper use and distribution of the people's money.

It is very evident that the present system of placing all the appropriations in the hands of one committee in the Senate is neither satisfactory nor suitable. I believe every Senator will admit this. The various committees of the House, such as Indian, Agricultural, Naval, and others, carefully consider and pass such appropriations as are deemed necessary, and send them, one at a time, to the single Appropriation Committee of the Senate. The result, year after year, is that all business in the Senate is clogged during its last days in order that the Senate may pass these various bills. The Senate Appropriations Committee itself can not properly consider them for lack of time, and adequate debate and consideration on the floor of the Senate are out of the question.

Every member of this body who has served in it during even one session will remember that when he wishes to change the report of the Appropriations Committee in relation to any item, no matter what its importance may be, in his judgment, to the country, or when he wishes to discuss any clause of the bill as it is reported to the Senate, he is met with an appeal by some member of the Appropriations Committee not to antagonize the bill, not to discuss it, because time is short and if delays occur the bills can not pass and the President will be driven to the necessity of calling an extra session. The threat of an extra session is hurled at us at the close of every session of Congress, and we are compelled to submissively accept, without argument or debate, the recommendation of the Appropriations Committee in reference to the expenditure of the people's money. It oftentimes happens that a Senator can not conscientiously allow certain items or clauses to remain in the bill as reported, and he so states emphatically. The Appropriations Committee time and time again meets these proper and just demands for discussion by allowing the changes proposed by the Senator to be made in the bill. After the bill is passed a conference committee of three Senators and three members of the Appropriations Committee of each branch of Congress is appointed, and when the result of their agreement is made known, after the session closes, it is generally found that these changes in the bill which the Senate itself has voted shall be made, and which the Appropriations Committee of the Senate has accepted, have been eliminated.

In the hurry and rush of the closing days it is almost impossible to tell what a conference report includes or means, and it is practically impossible, through fear of an extra session, to prevent the adoption of the report of the conferees. Almost always, at the close of a session, the President and his Cabinet are compelled to come to the Capitol in order to sign bills appropriating millions and millions of dollars which neither the Senate nor the President himself has had an opportunity to carefully and thoroughly examine. Under the present system, which leaves so much to the conferees, there is no means by which the Senate or the country can know what the appropriation bills contain until after Congress adjourns. Most of the Senators will remember a striking illustration of this in connection with the sundry civil bill of the Fiftieth Congress.

A provision was slipped into that bill by the conferees, withdrawing all the public lands which were embraced within the arid region of the country from settlement until certain impossible conditions were complied with. The representatives from that section, and the Congress generally, were not aware of this provision of the law until instructions were received by the various land officers, issued by the Secretary of the Interior, some months later, to carry the law into effect. Immediately upon the meeting of the Fifty-first Congress this provision of the appropriations bill was repealed. The people have a right to know what is being done with their money, and every facility possible should be given them and their representatives in Congress to understand the workings of the appropriations committees. When the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House, for instance, passes a bill appropriating money for the Indian Service, it should be sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate—so with the Naval, Military, Agricultural, and other committees. These various committees could then be working at the same time on these bills, and could present them to the consideration of the Senate as fast as they had completed their examination. It seems to me that in this way this undue crowding at the end of the session would, in a great measure, be avoided.

Another fact must be borne in mind, which is, that the Appropriations Committee of the Senate includes the ablest and the leading members of this body. Ordinarily they are on other committees of importance, and in addition to that they are expected by the country and by the Senate to be foremost in all general debates. If they devoted themselves exclusively to the work which devolves upon them, as members of the Appropriations Committee, they could not do full justice to the country in other matters, through lack of time notwithstanding their great ability and industry, which is conceded.

A reference to the personnel of the Appropriations Committee as at present constituted will convince any unprejudiced mind that other duties demand so much of their time and thought that they can not do justice to the country, the Senate, or themselves in attempting to supervise all the appropriations of the Government. They are the foremost men of the Senate, as I have stated, and the country looks to them as leaders in debate. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is the chairman. No matter what subject of importance is under consideration, the country and the Senate expect them to participate. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] are universally recognized as among the ablest debaters on this floor, and their attention and services are required at all times. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] are so conspicuous for their ability and eloquence that the country has a right to expect and does receive the benefit of their counsel on all general legislation. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is conceded to be among the best equipped men in public life, and in addition he is the recognized leader of nearly one-half this side of the Chamber on the currency question, if not of the entire Senate. His judgment is always in demand. And so it is with the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]; they are expected to and do take an active interest in all general legislation.

It has always been so and always will be. The members of this committee are properly and justly, on account of their learning and qualifications, among the leaders of the Senate. They have tremendous power as members of the Appropriations Committee, which perhaps they are loath to relinquish. This is human nature. They undertake the work of the committee and do as well as any other set of men could who have their responsibilities, but they have neither the time nor the physical ability to discharge with proper care the duties which the Senate has devolved upon them.

Through the customs and traditions of the Senate the younger members of this body in point of service are not expected to take much, if any, part in general debate. This leaves them ample time for committee work. By dividing the appropriations their abilities could be utilized. They would naturally be anxious to make a good record and to report only such bills as they could clearly and successfully defend before the country and the Senate. There is not a very great disparity, I take it, between the older and younger Senators in natural ability or patriotism, and I think that each member of the Senate should perform as much of the work, share as much of the care, enjoy as much of the honor, and be as much of a leader as possible.

Various bills at different times have been introduced in the Senate similar to the one now under consideration. There has never been much debate over them. They have in each instance been referred to the Committee on Rules, and there they slumber. Every Senator has thought of this subject, and I hope this proposed amendment will be fully discussed and that the Senate will express its judgment by a vote.

I trust that the proposed amendment will not be referred to the Committee on Rules until such reference is accompanied with an instruction from the Senate as to the decision of the Senate.

I am sure that no Senator will attribute to me any personal or selfish motive in this matter. My relations with each and every member of the Appropriations Committee are most cordial and pleasant. No one has a greater respect for that great committee individually and collectively than myself. They have treated me personally and the State which I have the honor in part to represent with the utmost consideration. They have taken especial pains, it seems to me, to aid and assist me. They have never refused a just and reasonable request of mine. Individually the change will not benefit me, for I am not a member of any of the committees which will secure the appropriation bills under my amendment, nor do I expect to be. I think it will be better for the country and better for the Senate if the labors of the Appropriations Committee are divided.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before this subject passes from the consideration of the Senate I wish to say a few words regarding it.

I agree with some of the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho, but do not agree with all. There are certain appropriation bills now sent to the Committee on Appropriations which, I think, ought to be sent to the appropriate committees charged with the subjects-matter. For instance, the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia are selected with a view to care for the interests of the people of this District, who have no other source of legislative power. The people of this city, therefore, go to the members of that committee to seek for such appropriations and for such legislation as they deem necessary for the welfare of the District. They are able probably to obtain general legislation, but the question of the appropriation of their money is not left to the committee to which they always have access, but is referred to a committee with which they have no connection whatever. Many citizens of Washington have complained to me of this matter, and have stated that when they had made their wants known before the committee having charge of the subject, the Committee on the District of Columbia, they were afterwards referred at the heel of a session to the Committee on Appropriations, which at such times is overburdened with work. It seems to be perfectly plain, therefore, that all appropriations in relation to the District of Columbia should be reported to us from the District Committee, so that we may have the benefit of their local knowledge.

Some time ago the river and harbor bill was very properly taken from the Committee on Appropriations, because that bill relates purely to matters of commerce. The members of the Committee on Appropriations are not required to look into the details of new improvements that are proposed and are to be appropriated for. Indeed, the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations should be confined to the great Departments of the Government.

I do not agree with my friend from Idaho that the Committee on Military Affairs ought to have charge of the appropriations for the Army, because the Army is provided for by law and the precise amount which each officer and soldier is to receive is fixed. That, therefore, is a proper matter for the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations, and the Army appropriation bill ought not to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, because that committee deals with legislation, and not with laws making appropriations. So with the Naval Committee. Undoubtedly the Committee on Appropriations ought to have charge of the appropriations for the Navy, because they, too, are limited by law, and the Committee on Naval Affairs, if they desire to have any new appropriations made or any change in the existing law, can propose their proper amendments without having the appropriations referred to them.

I think that all appropriations involved in new legislation should be referred to and decided and reported by the committees having charge of the legislation, leaving the great Committee on Appropriations to report as to the general expenses of the Government. Probably nine-tenths of all the appropriations should be sent to that committee, but the special appropriations, for the reasons I have stated, should be sent to other committees, and the rules ought to be so arranged. I think this could be done without in the slightest degree affecting either the power or the usefulness of the Committee on Appropriations. At the close of a session that committee is overburdened; indeed, it is almost impossible for a Senator to get access to it sufficiently to explain the importance of appropriations he desires to have put into a bill. That committee is pressed with the appropriation bills which come over here, all of which are thrust upon the Senate toward the close of a session. Much faulty legislation has been enacted on appropriation bills in consequence of the necessities of the case at the close of a session.

The Senator referred to one piece of legislation on an appropriation bill. It seems to me our rules ought to be so framed as to exclude all legislation on appropriation bills except such incidental legislation as is necessary to explain the item appropriated for. Any general legislation attached to appropriation bills is necessarily bad, because there is no opportunity to have any discussion in regard to it. Therefore the rule should explicitly require that all legislative provisions, even if they are to be attached to appropriation bills, should be first referred to the appropriate committees and have their sanction before being put upon appropriation bills, which are often hastily passed.

I hope the resolution at the proper time will be referred, and that the Senate, with full knowledge of their experience in the past, will divert some of the appropriation bills to the committees who have charge of the particular subjects-matter.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. In what year was the change made by which the river and harbor bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have forgotten. Probably the Senator from Iowa can tell.

Mr. ALLISON. Many years ago. I do not remember the exact time.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was a number of years ago.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate was created in 1867. Prior to that time all the appropriation bills were referred to the Finance Committee, with the exception of the river and harbor bill, which has been referred to the Committee on Commerce ever since 1826.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would say to the Senator from New York that when I was a member of the House of Representatives the Committee on Ways and Means of that body had charge of practically all the legislation of Congress, all the general appropriation bills, all tax bills, all tariff bills, and everything of that kind. Afterwards, as the Senator is probably aware, the House from time to time changed that and made two committees out of the one, one charged with raising revenue and the other charged with expenditures, which was proper. So various committees were authorized from time to time to take charge of the appropriations bearing upon their particular branch of the public service, and I think the Senate—although the Senate is a slow-moving body—after a careful examination will find that some of these appropriations ought to be referred to committees other than the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HILL. I suppose the Senator from Idaho does not desire action on the resolution this morning?

Mr. DUBOIS. No, I do not desire action this morning.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have the resoultion lie on the table for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. QUAY. I was not in the Senate when the resolution for the division of the various appropriation bills among committees was laid before it. I should be glad to have that resolution lie upon the table until I can prepare and offer an amendment, which, it seems to me, if the resolution be passed, ought to be incorporated with it, which shall provide for the establishment of a new Committee on Coinage and Currency, to which shall be referred questions in relation to those subjects, which now go to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table as indicated.

POLICY RESPECTING CUBA, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is now in order, and the first business will be stated.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN December 3, 1895, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate—

1. That the Government of the United States of America should promptly recognize the revolutionists of Cuba, who are now honestly struggling to secure their independence of the Spanish Government, as composing an independent nation and possessing the rights thereof, according to the law of nations.
2. That all islands in close proximity to the mainland of the United States of America should, as speedily as possible, by treaties of purchase, be annexed to this Government, as essential to our safety in times of war and the convenience and necessity of our commerce in times of peace.
3. That the wise declaration of President Monroe, known as the Monroe doctrine, is a well-established policy of the Government of the United States, and should be promptly and effectually maintained by the Government in its original purity and purpose.
4. That while the Government of the United States should not needlessly or hastily embroil itself with any foreign power, and should only resort to extreme measures in cases of absolute necessity, a firmer and more prompt policy on the part of this Government in maintaining the rights of American citizens abroad should be introduced and pursued.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I suppose the resolution will probably have to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not know that I can or should say anything in addition to what I have already said in its support. I do hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations, when it comes to consider the different resolutions which have been introduced upon the subject of the Monroe doctrine, will not only take into account the condition of our country with reference to our coast defenses, and recommend to the Senate and to the country the adoption of such measures as will secure the erection of adequate defenses for coast purposes, but that it will recommend to Congress some measure which will secure to this country the control of all the islands and lands adjacent to our shores which will be essential in our commerce and in times of war.

It has been said in this Chamber and out of it that the Populist party was a local organization; that it dealt simply with certain internal grievances; that it was composed of a class of people who had no conception of government beyond their own immediate and pressing personal demands. I desire to correct that opinion, if I can do so, by saying that, in my judgment, the Populist party is as thoroughly committed to the Monroe doctrine as either the Democratic or the Republican party. It occurs to me that there should be no division of sentiment among our people upon the question of the necessity of making ample protection for our country against foreign invasion and in pursuing that course which will strengthen its commerce and carrying trade.

I was delighted yesterday to listen to the eloquent speech of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], in which he portrayed so vividly the doctrine laid down by President Monroe in his message and pointed out to us the fact that Great Britain is now planting its flag upon every island in the sea, that it is pursuing a policy of aggression, acquiring territory and possessions which are liable to menace the peace and prosperity of our nation, and I felt at that time as though it would be entirely germane to the subject and proper for me to put to the Senator the question whether he did not believe that the time had come when we should not only protect the coasts of this country from foreign invasion, or the possibility of foreign invasion, but when we should protect the country itself from British invasion.

I did not hear the Senator say anything about the millions and billions of dollars of English capital that have been brought into this country. I did not hear him refer to the fact that English money has purchased our great flouring mills, our great railway systems, our breweries, our stock yards, and the great majority of the important industries of this country. I did not hear the distinguished and brilliant Senator from Illinois yesterday discuss the question of the seeming partnership existing between the Democratic and Republican parties in this country and the money lords of Lombard street and of the East. If it is important for us to watch the British flag when it is placed indiscriminately upon the islands of the sea, does it not occur to my distinguished friend that it would be important for us, Mr. President, to watch the financial partnership existing between certain financiers and statesmen of England and other foreign countries and certain financiers and political parties in this country?

I do not believe the time will ever come when this Government will be called upon to defend itself or its territory against British aggression; but I believe the time has come when it is essential to the welfare and well-being of our people that we Americanize instead of anglicize our institutions. It is comparatively a matter of indifference to us whether the boundary line between Venezuela and the British possessions is established upon American or upon British theories; but it is important for us, Mr. President, to preserve the institutions of this country from British aggressions. We realize that Great Britain is in our midst, not with her armies and her navies, not perhaps with her flag, but she is here for the purpose of dethroning American institutions; she is here for the purpose of anglicizing these States and this country, and controlling the policy of our nation and the policy of our Government in every branch and department. Sir, it has become a popular thing now for an American citizen to become an English lord or the lord of some other country. I was reading in an Eastern newspaper but a few days ago of an American consul, holding a position under this Government at this time, who is to become a baron of Austria. A few years ago his ancestors were common people in this country, working at common and humble occupations, and yet, through a little financial and political success, this gentleman has become ashamed of his native country, and while he holds the important office of consul under the present Administration, he is willing to receive the title of baron from a foreign country.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that that subject should have attracted the attention of the distinguished Senator from Illinois. I do not know that it would be improper for me to refer to the spirit of madness which seems to exist in this country, by which even American women are perfectly willing to waste themselves upon titled foreign mendicants. I wish there were some way of providing for that in the legislation which is contemplated by my friend from Illinois.

I hope, however, that this resolution will receive due consideration at the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to hear the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The resolution will again be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Nebraska has no objection, I should like to have the resolution remain on the table for a few days, as I desire to submit some remarks on the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his motion, and the resolution will lie on the table, in the absence of objection.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RULES.

Mr. HILL. At the last session I submitted three amendments to the rules, which I desire to offer at this time. I ask that the resolutions may lie on the table and be printed.

The resolutions were severally submitted and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule IX be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business, and the same shall have been debated on divers days, amounting in all to thirty days, it shall be in order for any Senator at any time to move to fix a time for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable, and shall be immediately put, and if passed by a majority of all the members of the Senate, the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be had at the date fixed in such original motion without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent; and during the pendency of such motion to fix a date and also at the time fixed by the Senate for voting upon bill or resolution no other motion of any kind or character shall be entertained until such motion or such bill or resolution shall have been finally voted upon."

Resolved, That Rule XII be amended by inserting an additional clause, as follows:

"When upon a vote by yeas and nays it shall appear to the Presiding Officer, upon recapitulation and before the announcement of the result, that a quorum has not voted, he shall call upon Senators present who have not voted by name to vote, and shall direct the Secretary to add to the list of the Senators voting the names of the Senators present not voting, including those announcing pairs or who may or may not be excused from voting, and to enter the same in the Journal; and if the whole number constitute a quorum, and it shall appear that a majority of a quorum (or two-thirds of a quorum where the Constitution prescribes a majority of two-thirds) has voted on either side, the question shall be deemed to have been determined and the result shall be announced the same as if a quorum had voted."

Resolved, That subdivision 2 of Rule V of the standing rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate; but no Senator while speaking shall be interrupted by any other Senator raising the question of the lack of a quorum, and the question as to the presence of a quorum shall not be raised oftener than once in every hour; but this provision shall not apply where the absence of a quorum is disclosed upon any roll call of the yeas and nays."

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the order of Senate resolutions shall have been reached, I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the concurrent resolution heretofore submitted by me in relation to the outrages in Armenia.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 12, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 12, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a bill from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians, in the State of North Dakota, and to make appropriation for carrying the same into effect; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

Mr. VILAS submitted the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., for the year 1895; which was ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Fremont, Nebr., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of C. P. Huntington, president of the Southern Pacific Railway Company, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the improvement of the harbor at port of Los Angeles, Santa Monica, Cal., in accordance with the plan recommended by William Hood, chief engineer of the Southern Pacific Railway Company; which, with the accompanying papers and maps, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HILL presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Central Congregational Church, of Brooklyn, N. Y., representing nearly a thousand families, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide transports and designate ports where they may be loaded with food and clothes donated by American citizens for the use of destitute Armenians; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented the petition of M. R. Hathaway, of Vancouver, in the State of Washington, praying that he be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BAKER. Some days ago I introduced two bills, a bill (S. 252) for the relief of Stalnaker Marteney, and a bill (S. 254) for the relief of Jerome Kunkel; and they were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Since then I have received some proofs which I think ought to be submitted in connection with the bills. I present the affidavits and move that they be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 404) granting a pension to Samuel Goldwater, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 30) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893, to report it favorably without amendment, and, because of the matter contained in the bill and the peculiar circumstances which render early action desirable, I am instructed to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill upon its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 17 of the act approved March 2, 1893, entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," so as to read:

SEC. 17. That said court in special term may certify to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia for decision there, in the first instance, any question of law that shall arise during any proceedings in said court in special term under this act. Any party aggrieved by the final order or decree of said court in special term fixing the amount of damages, or the assessment for benefits as to any parcel of land, may take an appeal to said court of appeals and shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases triable by jury, and said court of appeals may affirm, reverse, or modify the order or decree appealed from: Provided, That said court of appeals shall consider only questions of law arising on such appeal. From a final judgment of said court in special term under this act, distributing the damages among contending claimants, any party aggrieved may in like manner take an appeal to the court of appeals, which court in such cases shall consider both questions of law and fact. Any appeal under this act to the court of appeals shall be taken within twenty days after the making of the final order or decree appealed from, and not afterwards, and shall be subject to the laws and rules of court regulating appeals to said court of appeals. Cases arising under this act shall have precedence in said court over all other cases except criminal cases, and the decision of said court of appeals upon any question arising under this act shall be final: Provided, That from any judgment or order of said court of appeals involving any question as to the constitutionality of this act or of any part thereof any party aggrieved may within thirty days after such judgment or order shall be entered appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Said court shall determine only the questions of constitutionality involved in the case, and shall have power to make such special rules and regulations applying to appeals under this act as may be proper to bring such cases to a speedy hearing and determination.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONTHLY STATEMENT OF IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, to report it without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there shall be printed monthly by the Public Printer 3,500 copies of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports and other statistical information prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 500 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland why the number is limited to 3,500 copies. It seems to me that 3,500 copies of a document such as that is a very small number. If I am not mistaken in the importance of the document, a much larger number will be necessary. The Committee on Printing, of course, has considered the matter; but it strikes my mind as being an unusually and an improperly small number of such a document.

Mr. GORMAN. In 1890, I think, the Senate directed the Committee on Printing to make a very thorough investigation as to the number of documents of this character that should be printed for all the Departments. The late Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Manderson, then chairman of the committee, submitted a very thorough and exhaustive report. At that time there were 2,150 copies of this document, the monthly abstract, not the annual, printed by the Department. When the committee considered the matter the officers of the Treasury Department at that time supposed, and so recommended to the committee, that 1,000, which is the usual number in all the Departments limited by the recent printing act, would be sufficient in this case. It appears that heretofore out of the general fund for printing for the Department the Secretary of the Treasury has had the option to order, when an important publication was in hand, that an extra number should be printed. That he is now prohibited from doing. The passage of this joint resolution providing for 3,500 copies in addition to the 1,000 copies provided for by the printing act makes 4,500 copies—500 more than has ever been printed heretofore. In view of the importance of the document the committee thought it wise to pass the proposed resolution and make an exception in this case.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CALL. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Maryland. Do I understand this to be the annual publication of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department?

Mr. GORMAN. It is the monthly statement, not the annual, and the joint resolution provides for printing 3,500 copies in addition to the 1,000 copies provided for by law.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change of reference will be made, in the absence of objection.

PRINTING OF COINAGE BILL AS A DOCUMENT.

Mr. CHANDLER. Some days ago I introduced a bill (S. 496) to provide, in connection with other nations, for the unlimited coinage of gold and silver at a ratio of 1 to 15½. I move that the bill be reprinted as a document, with an accompanying letter from Mr. Robert Stein.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTRIC WIRES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. By request I offer a series of resolutions for reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia, for the consideration of the committee. I myself know nothing about the resolutions.

The resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

Whereas Congress by act approved July 18, 1888, provided that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia should not after the 15th day of September, 1888, permit or authorize any additional telegraph, telephone, electric lighting, or other wires to be erected or maintained on or over any of the streets or avenues of the city of Washington, and further directed said Commissioners to investigate and report to Congress the best method of removing all such electric wires from the air or surface of said streets and interring the same under ground; and

Whereas it was by said last above-mentioned act and the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, provided that said Commissioners should have power at any time before the expiration of the Fifty-first Congress, and not later, to authorize any such existing overhead wires to be placed under ground; and

Whereas under and by virtue of the provisions of said acts certain companies owning overhead wires within the District of Columbia, acting under permits from said Commissioners, removed a large number of such overhead wires and interred the same under ground, thus establishing an underground system of electric wires; and

Whereas the act of Congress approved August 6, 1890, created an Electrical Commission to investigate and report, through the President, to Congress upon the best method of removing overhead wires and placing the same under ground, which said Commission, upon the 26th day of October, 1891, submitted its report to the President, and which said report was by the President transmitted to Congress December 23, 1891, said report still pending and unacted upon by Congress; and

Whereas by act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, it was provided that the said Commissioners might grant permits for the construction, within certain limitations, of other conduits or subways additional to those already at that date then in existence under previous acts of Congress, under and by virtue of which said act of March 3, 1891, the companies owning such existing underground conduits were granted permits and have constructed certain additions and extensions of previously existing subways; and

Whereas no further or other legislation exists authorizing said Commissioners to permit the erection of additional overhead wires or the construction of other conduits or subways within said District; and

Whereas the obvious intention of Congress, as expressed in all its legislation upon the subject, has been to prohibit the further erection of overhead electric wires in the District of Columbia and the ultimate placing of all electric wires in the District of Columbia under ground, the same to be done only under such regulations and conditions as might be by Congress prescribed: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether, since the 15th day of December, 1888, any permits have been issued for the construction or erection of additional overhead wires in the District of Columbia; and if so, to whom such permits were given and under what authority of law the same purport to have been issued, together with a list of such permits, and whether thereunder any additional overhead wires have been erected in said District; and if so, where and by whom the same has been done. Also whether, under the said act of March 3, 1891, or under any other act, any permits have been issued by said Commissioners for the placing under ground in any of the avenues, streets, alleys, sidewalks, footways, or other public ways in the District of Columbia of any conduits or subways for electric wires which were not an addition to or an extension of a previously existing conduit or subway established under previously existing law; and if so, the names of the persons or corporations to whom such permits have been issued, the avenues, streets, alleys, foot walks, or other passageways covered by such permits, what work, if any, has been done under such permits, and by whom and under what authority of law said permits purport to have been issued and said work performed.

Be it further resolved, That, pending the report hereinbefore called for, and thereafter until action by Congress thereon, the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, requested to issue no further permits for the erection of any overhead wires in said District, and if any such permits have been issued to revoke said permits and prevent the erection thereunder of any further overhead wires. Further, that no additional permits be granted for the construction of any further electric conduits or subways in the District of Columbia, and that if any such permits have already been issued the same be revoked, and no further work be permitted thereunder until further action by Congress.

EXCHANGE BETWEEN GOLD AND SILVER STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire what effect the difference of exchange between gold-standard countries and silver-standard countries has upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the resolution may lie over, and when it comes up in its order next Monday I give notice that I shall submit some remarks upon the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

PHOSPHATE LANDS.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and are, required to investigate the decision of the Interior Department in the case of Gray and others, deciding that phosphate was not a mineral and phosphate lands not subject to the mining laws, reversing and overruling both the decisions of former Secretaries of the Interior and the decisions of the present Secretary in other cases, and the act of Congress entitled "An act for the protection of actual settlers who made homestead or preemption entries on the public lands of the United States in the State of Florida upon which deposits of phosphates have been discovered since such entries were made," approved October 1, 1890, and report to the Senate whether such decisions are made without authority of law, and also report by bill or otherwise such legislation as may be necessary to secure to the people their rights under the laws relative to mineral lands.

RIGHT OF FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the imprisonment of citizens of the United States by a United States court for alleged contempt of its order or process by the exercise of their right of freedom of speech and opinion as to the right of the laboring people of the United States in the employment of railroad or other corporations to organize for the protection of their rights as they regard them is an exercise of power dangerous to the Republic and to the liberty of the people, and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate is hereby instructed to report a bill to the Senate forbidding the exercise of such authority and declaring such imprisonment unlawful.

RAILROAD LANDS IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are, instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the approval of public lands by the Secretary of the Interior to the State of Florida for the benefit of the Florida Central and Peninsula Railroad Company, alleged to be under the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 17th of May, A. D. 1856, and entitled "An act granting land to the States of Alabama and Florida," etc., is not in violation of the said act of Congress, without authority of law, and void and of no effect; also whether such lands are not subject to homestead entry under the laws of the United States.

II. To report, by bill or otherwise, such legislation as may be necessary to protect the rights of homestead settlers on such land, and for the issue of patents to innocent purchasers of land in limited quantities who have bought and paid for such land in good faith.

TEMPORARY DISPLACEMENT OF BILLS, ETC.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Senate rules be amended by the following as an additional rule:

"RULE —.

"It shall be in order, whenever a bill, resolution, or other proceeding of the Senate is pending, to move that it shall be temporarily laid aside and some other bill, proceeding, or resolution take its place, and the pending bill, resolution, or order be the regular order after the consideration of the bill temporarily taken up shall be concluded. If a majority shall vote in favor of temporarily laying aside the pending bill, the bill, order, resolution, or proceeding designated in the motion shall be temporarily taken up for consideration, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed in the motion, but such motion shall not be in order more than once on the same day in reference to the same bill, order, resolution, or proceeding."

INCREASE OF COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved, That the Committees on Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, Judiciary, Foreign Relations, Appropriations, Commerce, and Interstate Commerce shall each consist of fifteen members.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, instructed and directed to report to the Senate, at the earliest practicable date, whether or not he has expended the whole or any part of the appropriation for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins made by the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896," and if a part only of said appropriation has been used, to state what part thereof has been expended and for what purpose, specifically stating how much of the appropriation not authorized to be expended for farmers' bulletins has been used, and the items for which it has been expended; also, if any part of the appropriation for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds as required by law has not been expended, to state why such seeds have not been purchased under said appropriation in accordance with the existing statutes relating thereto; and also to transmit to the Senate a copy of each bid or offer made to the said Department to furnish it with seeds, bulbs, cuttings, etc., in response to its advertisement dated April 27, 1895, or otherwise submitted for its consideration, together with a copy of each letter sent to the Department relative to or asking any information concerning or modification of the proposals issued and a copy of its reply thereto.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. WHITE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That Rule XIX be amended by inserting at the end of paragraph 1 thereof the following: "All debate shall be relevant and confined to the subject directly before the Senate."

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the resolution may be printed and lie on the table. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, after the termination of the routine morning business, I shall offer some remarks to the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendment proposed by me in connection with the amendments proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT OF CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to call up a little bill, No. 7 on the Calendar, about which there will be no controversy. It lies upon the table, and I wish to have it acted upon. I think there will be no possible objection to it. It is a little bill in reference to a port of entry——

Mr. COCKRELL. Do not let us set the precedent of calling up individual cases. Let us go to the Calendar and take up all similar cases.

Mr. CULLOM. The only reason why I call up the bill is because it is very important to the locality it affects, and no one——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a private pension bill, and there are a number of them on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. No, it is not a pension bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. No. 7 on the Calendar is certainly a private pension bill.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a bill on the table from the other House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh!

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to have it amended and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator spoke of it as being No. 7 on the Calendar, and No. 7 on the Calendar is a private pension bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Illinois refers to a bill lying on the table, I take it, not having been referred.

Mr. CULLOM. It is the bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes relative to ports of entry.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill is not on the Calendar of General Orders; it is on the table; and on our printed Calendar there should be some distinction made so as not to give "Subjects on the Table" the same numbers that are borne by bills on the regular "Calendar of Business."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the bill called up by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ALLISON. It is, I understand, a bill coming from the House of Representatives, which has not been referred to a committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Such is the case.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill at this time, but I think as a rule all bills that are considered in the Senate should first be referred to a committee and reported from that committee. I merely put in a caveat on the subject of taking up bills from the table.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2601, Revised Statutes, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2601. There shall be in the States of Indiana and Illinois one collection district, as follows:

"The district of Chicago; to comprise the State of Illinois, and the waters and shores of Lake Michigan within the State of Indiana; in which Chicago shall be the port of entry, and Waukegan and Michigan City ports of delivery: Provided, That all present ports of delivery in the State of Illinois now a part of the New Orleans district shall be ports of delivery in the new district of Illinois and shall have all privileges which they have under existing law."

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say that this bill really affects nothing but the city of Aurora, 36 miles outside of Chicago. The purpose of it is to avoid the necessity of compelling the people who are shipping ores to a smelting establishment in that city to go clear to New Orleans in order to pay the duty on the ore coming from Canada. That is a matter of great inconvenience to those people, as well as to the smelting company in Aurora. The bill affects nothing else whatever.

I will state to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], so that he may understand it perfectly, that the city of East St. Louis, which is in Illinois, and which would be affected by the bill were it not excepted, is excepted, so that the people there can pay the duties, etc., in the city of St. Louis. The bill leaves East St. Louis in the St. Louis district, and I offer an amendment to it which will make that point perfectly clear.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the provisions of the act approved August 7, 1882, which embraces East St. Louis, Ill., within the limits of the port of St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment saves that point. I desire to say that this bill really comes from the Treasury Department; that the Department has asked that this arrangement be made so as to avoid the trouble of going to New Orleans in order to settle with the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the concurrent resolution which I presented some days ago in relation to the atrocities which have been committed upon the Armenians may be laid before the Senate that I may submit some very brief observations regarding it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. CALL on the 10th instant, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That humanity and religion and the principles on which all civilization rests demand that the civilized governments shall by peaceful negotiations, or if necessary by force of arms, prevent and suppress the cruelties and massacres inflicted on the Armenian subjects of Turkey by the establishment of a government of their own people, with such guaranties by the civilized powers of its authority and permanence as shall be adequate to that end.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the Secretary read portions of a paper which I have marked and which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOSTON, November 27.

The following is a condensation of letters received in Boston descriptive of the recent massacre in Erzerum, eastern Turkey.

* * * * * * *

The stories of hairbreadth escapes and thrilling experiences and horrible murder were sickening in the extreme. Two Armenians hidden in some hay witnessed the killing of 11 persons. One man was called to the door by an officer who professed to be friendly and was shot down in cold blood. Others were cruelly murdered.

The death roll must be toward 300. Between 50 and 60 wounded are in the hospital. Two hundred dead were gathered in the Armenian cemetery, some of them most horribly mutilated. There must be many wounded in the different houses. All sorts of rumors are about of another bloody attack being determined on. The people are in an awful state of dread. I did what I could to reassure them. The collection of the dead goes on; 316 collected in the graveyard. The pillaged houses are to be counted by the hundreds. No house that was attacked was left till it was emptied of every movable thing.

One heartrending scene was the following: A battered door was pushed aside, which admitted us to a long passageway; the door at the end of the passageway was in splinters. Passing it, we entered the lower room or kitchen of the house. In the middle of this small room, lying side by side on a mat, were the bodies of two young women, almost naked, and a light covering thrown over their heads. At the other side of the room a grief-stricken woman was trying to make bread from a little flour that had been left. She had to borrow utensils to do it. She left her work and came forward, and answered the first question by removing the covering from their bodies. They were those of young women. A companion of these two had been carried off, and was lying dead in another house. Their lives had been sacrificed in defense of their honor.

The bodies lying in the cemetery are simply wrecks of human beings. Awful cruelty was practiced. The majority have bullet wounds. Nearly all have bayonet, sword, and dagger wounds, some badly mutilated. Two or three were skinned, and some were burned with kerosene. A great many women are missing. Very many dead have been disposed of by the Turks themselves. There are hundreds who have nothing to eat and no means of getting anything. The wounded are being collected. The killed far exceed the wounded. The villages of the plain have suffered awfully. No definite news—only that which columns of smoke told.

The massacre evidently was a prearranged affair. It began all over the city at the same moment. A bugle was sounded, and the soldiers began. They first said, "No harm to women and children," but they soon passed those bounds. A soldier who was on guard says that the order was given by the Porte.

Mr. GALLINGER. In that connection I have a clipping from the New York Sun of December 1 which purports to have been written by an eyewitness of a horrible massacre in Armenia, which I should like to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

A MASSACRE IN ARMENIA—ACCOUNT BY AN EYEWITNESS OF THE SLAUGHTER IN BAIBURT VILLAGES.

The following description of scenes accompanying the recent massacres in the villages of Baibурt, in Armenia, is contained in a letter received here from an eyewitness. It was written toward the latter part of October:

"Sunday, October 13, was the first day when the alarm of a general massacre began to spread. Saturday afternoon the dismal news of the advance of 500 armed Lazes reached us. Sunday about a thousand Turks of Baiburt and its vicinity joined the Lazes, and marched from all directions on the Armenian villages. On Monday, October 14, the first attack was made on the village of Lusshonk, 5 or 6 miles from the town of Baiburt. There were about seventy Turkish women with pack horses for carrying away the plunder. The villagers of Lusshonk had taken refuge in the school building, trembling and despairing. The Lazes and others promptly began to seize the cattle and sheep of the Armenians, and after securing them out of harm's way rifled the houses and set on fire the buildings. Then they attacked the schoolhouse. The helpless Armenians inside, men, women, and children, shrieked under a hailstorm of bullets. It was a dark night, and many fell, killed and wounded.

"'For God's sake spare our lives and take all we have.' cried the unfortunate people, but their cries for mercy seemed to more infuriate the butchers. The schoolhouse was set on fire and men, women, and children rushed out, trampling under their feet the fallen dead and wounded.

"A most horrible scene was enacted in front of the schoolhouse. The infuriated Lazes and other marauders, under the lead of the most fanatical chieftains from the city and neighboring villages, surrounded their victims and began to massacre them in cold blood. The son of Haji Khumri, a notorious robber, seized a young man, and, after robbing him of his clothes, ordered the Lazes to fire on him. The young man was shot dead on the spot. Others seized the brother of the first victim, and casting him down on the threshold of the schoolhouse, slaughtered him like a sheep and pierced his dead body with daggers. Moussa, the son of Birinji, from Moushangars, jumped at Nahabed Aslanian, and, taking hold of him, exclaimed:

"'Come here, dog of an infidel; I was looking for you. Come, I will show you how I will kill a dog like you!'

"Saying this, he plunged his kama into his victim and with several turns disemboweled the unfortunate man. Thus the fiendish work of carnage was carried on with heartrending cruelty. At last the leaders of the mob gave the command to separate the men and the women into separate groups under the walls. Five young men, the flower of the village, were selected as victims and burned alive before the eyes of their relatives. Others of the mob robbed the women of all their clothes, committing outrages on them, cutting their hair, spitting in their faces, etc. They were not satisfied with outrages, but killed also Haiganoush, a girl 15 years of age, several women, and three children, from three to five years of age. They killed also Gadariné, the wife of Channers Avakian, who was in an advanced state of pregnancy, and opened her abdomen with a most cruel ferocity. The scenes of horror were repeated in several other places in the same village and in other villages. The Mohammedan women accompanying the hordes of marauders carried away loads of plunder.

"The Armenians had given no provocation for the massacre. The leaders proclaimed openly that they had orders from the Sultan to exterminate the Armenians, and were to have their property as a reward for their services to the Government. It is impossible to give a correct estimate of the loss of life and property, as many villages are now laid waste and the inhabitants are missing. It is not necessary to dwell on the desecrations perpetrated in the churches and the outrages committed on women and young girls. It makes one's heart bleed to see the state of things. The people in the vicinity are in a state of terror, and there are rumors of fresh massacres."

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the traditional policy of this Government is that there shall be no entangling alliances with foreign nations, but I do not understand this to mean that this great people, 75,000,000 of the foremost people of the world, shall take no part in the great efforts that may be made by the civilized nations to suppress outrage, barbarism, and cruelty when it is upon so large a scale that it threatens the civilization and the religions of the world. No record of such barbarity, of massacres so extensive, of cruelties so outraging every sentiment of civilized man is to be found in history as this record of the Turkish massacre of the innocent people of Armenia.

We have proclaimed to the nations of the world that governments are established to preserve the rights of man—the right to liberty, to life, to the pursuit of happiness. We have inscribed that upon the banners of this country, and have proclaimed that we have a Government founded upon this declaration. Now, when all the civilized nations of the world are uniting not only to express their condemnation of this barbarism, but to determine, by force of arms if necessary, to suppress it and to guarantee that civilization shall not be disgraced by its continuance, it is a question for us whether, taking precedence of all others in the advocacy of principles which are for the exaltation of the masses of mankind, we shall refrain from even the expression of encouragement to the civilized powers in the great work which they are undertaking.

This, Mr. President, is no mere ebullition of violence, temporary and transient in its nature. It is a settled purpose on the part of the hordes of Eastern barbarism to suppress the civilization which is based upon the religion and the faith that we profess; and while we have no concern with the religious faith of any people or any individual, we are concerned that the civilization which we represent shall not be overthrown by intolerance, by bigotry, by superstition, by cruelty, and crime of every character. In my judgment, the people of this country can not perform their duty as a civilized nation without taking part in the progress of the human mind toward the suppression of these disorders and these cruelties, which are predicated upon the overthrow of the principles upon which this Government is founded.

If it be true that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, if it be not a falsehood that governments are instituted for these purposes, to preserve and to protect these rights, then when there exists a barbarism based upon principles which destroy and overthrow the very foundations of this Government, it is, in my judgment, the duty of the Senate of the United States and of the House of Representatives, representing the people, to speak in terms of no uncertain meaning as to the purposes and the power and the policy of this Government.

It is a duty we owe to civilization, to religious tolerance, to all the highest and best interests of humanity, to ourselves, and the destiny of the Republic, to aid the progress of the nations toward liberty and fraternity. We should join the powers in breaking the deadlock in Europe and establishing a government over Armenia of her own people strong enough to defend and establish their people in the right and opportunity which our civilization demands. We can not escape the obligation of our duty to the nations of the world, and we should not if we could.

Shall we not join the powers, then, in denouncing and suppressing the cruelties perpetrated on an innocent people in denial of these principles? Shall not the great Republic, speaking the voice of 75,000,000 of the foremost people of the world, speaking the voice of that religion which commands all men to be gentle and easy to be entreated, join the powers in staying the waves of that new barbarism, far greater and crueler than those of the Goths in their invasion of Rome, with which the hordes of the East threaten to invade Christendom and with intolerant bigotry extinguish with torch and dagger and brutal crime and outrage the religion of the Cross—our faith—for that of Mohammed?

Our Republic, which has proclaimed to the nations peace and good will among men, human rights, and the exaltation of the masses, should not withhold its great power when the nations are joining together and asserting their power to suppress the crime and cruelty which brutalizes the race and destroys alike civilization and religion in the fire of superstition and religious intolerance and bigotry, nor refuse agreement with foreign nations to suppress the oppression, the cruelty, and the barbarism of despotic rule over the people of other lands. We made treaty agreements with foreign countries to suppress the African slave trade, and this establishes a precedent which authorizes and demands the like action as to any other equal cruelties and barbarism, and demands that our country, with its great power, should join the civilized nations.

With these observations, I ask that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I hope they will report it favorably. Let us take our place among the nations of the world, if not for entangling alliances, at least for the assertion of the principles which are necessary to protect our civilization itself against the barbarism that threatens it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will withdraw the motion a moment, unless it is the intention of the Senator to have the Senate resume its legislative session, as I want to submit some remarks at some time upon the first bill on the Calendar, and am ready to proceed to-day and shall probably not occupy more than forty minutes at the outside, I may as well do it now as at any other time.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Kansas desires to submit his remarks now I will withdraw the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from West Virginia is withdrawn, and the Chair lays before the Senate the first bill on the Calendar, which is the bill referred to by the Senator from Kansas.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during sessions of Congress.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever, during a session of the Congress of the United States, a member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall die at any place within the District of Columbia, the House of which he was a member shall appoint a special committee of its members to properly prepare and incase the body of the deceased and forward it, in charge of a sergeant-at-arms specially appointed, to the home of the deceased, and deliver it to his family, or to his relatives or friends in case he had no family.

SEC. 2. That no action or proceeding requiring the expenditure of public money, other than is herein provided for, shall be taken or had in case of the death of any Senator or Representative.

SEC. 3. That the expenses necessarily incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on vouchers certified by the chairman of the committee that prepared the remains, and by the sergeant-at-arms who delivered them, and approved by the presiding officer of the proper House.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, my attention was first drawn to the subject of Congressional funerals by criticisms in the newspaper press. Two objections were urged to the custom—one, that it was expensive; the other, that it partook more of the character of joyous excursions than of funeral processions, and hence sometimes lacks that decorum which is regarded as especially appropriate on such occasions.

Since becoming a member of this body I have had opportunities to witness the elaborate preparations and the expensive proceedings incident to these occasions. I was a member of the committee that accompanied the remains of my colleague, Senator Plumb, to the home of his family in Kansas, and had an opportunity to see for myself that such a proceeding, conducted as that was, not only in every respect decorously, but economically, as such things go, is necessarily very expensive. The money paid out of the Treasury on account of Senator Plumb's funeral, and on vouchers that I as chairman of the committee approved, amounted to upward of $3,000, equal to the estimated value of an average American farm.

From that time forward I gave the matter more thought. I found that, although the home of Senator Plumb was about 1,400 miles from Washington, the expense attending his obsequies were much less than the average of similar occasions in recent years. The aggregate seemed very large to be taken out of the public Treasury without some constitutional warrant, and I made up my mind the custom ought to be discontinued.

Some interesting facts will develop as the history of the contingent fund of the Senate is examined. It is out of the contingent fund that these funeral expenses are paid. Every permanent legislative body provides a contingent fund from which to draw in cases of emergency and when it is not practicable to await the slow action of parliamentary procedure in legislation. There are times and occasions when action becomes necessary, and what is done must be done promptly. So, too, there are many things, small in themselves, which legislative bodies require for their comfort or convenience, that can be better provided for as occasions arise than if intrusted to the deliberations of the body when enacting laws.

The furnishing of a committee room is a small matter, but it is one of the necessary adjuncts of a legislature, and an intelligent janitor knows better what to provide than the Senate or House does. There are a great many little details connected with the equipment of a great building that has been erected and partitioned especially for legislative purposes, and these must necessarily be in large measure left to the discretion of officers appointed to look after such things.

It happens, sometimes, that a foreign dignitary visits our country, and when he arrives at the seat of government, if Congress is in session, it is properly expected that some public and official manifestation of respect will be shown. This is attended with expense, and as it was not foreseen, and therefore was not specifically provided for in appropriation bills, it must be paid out of moneys set apart for contingencies. Such an occasion was presented in the case of Louis Kossuth in 1852.

In order to provide in advance for all contingencies that may require the expenditure of money on short notice by legislatures and by the executive departments of States and nations, certain appropriations are made in advance, to be available as occasion may require, and these amounts are known as contingent funds.

The setting apart of public moneys for "contingent expenses" is old, much older than the Government of the United States. It was a custom in the British Parliament, and it descended from that body, through the Continental Congress, to us.

It was ordered August 28, 1777, "That $3,000 be advanced to the President of Congress, he to be accountable," and when President Hancock resigned it was found that there was due him $1,392.32 "for expenditures by him for the use of Congress."

When Henry Laurens was chosen President of the Congress it was ordered, November 19, 1777, "That $1,000 be advanced to the President to pay expresses and other contingent expenses, for which he is to be accountable," etc.

In an appropriation act of the First Congress of the United States, approved by President Washington, is found an item of "contingent expenses for defraying the expenses of the civil list under the late and present Government."

An appropriation act for the support of Government for the year 1793 provided "for the expenses of firewood, stationery, printing work, and all other contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, $9,552."

This common appropriation of money for the contingent expenses of the Senate and the House of Representatives was continued until 1831, the amount appropriated gradually increasing. In the "act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1831," the appropriation for contingent expenses was divided, as follows:

"For stationery, fuel, printing, and all other incidental and contingent expenses of the Senate, $29,685."

"For stationery, fuel, printing, and all other incidental and contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, $100,000."

"The said two sums last named to be applied to the payment of the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, severally, and to no other purpose."

It was from the "contingent fund" that Senators, in the early days of the Republic, were supplied, at the public expense, with newspapers of their own selection. "Stationery was supplied them without limit, and they used large quantities of English-laid gilt-edged letter paper at $8 per ream, and of English hot-pressed quarto post paper at $9 per ream. Penknives were purchased every session by the dozen, with silver pencil cases, seals, memorandum books, wafer boxes, and other articles known as stationery, because they are sold by stationers. When committees of the Senate or its Secretary had occasion to wait on the President of the United States their hack hire was paid from the 'contingent money.'"

It appears that a good many articles used by Senators and paid for out of the "contingent fund" were hardly such as would reasonably be regarded necessary aids in legislation. In looking over the many lists from year to year in the early years of the Senate I find wine, brandy, Cognac, almonds, raisins, sirup, soda water, etc.

In calling attention to these charges against the contingent fund, it is not my object to excite ridicule, but to show that, whatever things were regarded at that time as properly coming within the meaning of contingent expenses, funeral processions extending hundreds and thousands of miles over the country were not among the number. In the early history of Congress there were no public expenses incurred on account of the death of a Senator. Twenty years passed before the first item appears.

Francis Malbone, a Senator from Rhode Island, died at Washington, June, 1809, and his remains were buried in the Congressional Cemetery. Most of the Senators, very properly, attended the funeral services, and the part they took was necessarily attended with some expense. Among the items charged to the account of the contingent fund for such expenses were 16 pounds of crackers, $3, and 11¼ pounds cheese, $2.81. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate allowed the cracker item, but not that of cheese.

The second instance of charge on this account does not appear until the year 1826, although up to that time 22 Senators had died. Three Senators died during the year 1826, and the aggregate public expenditure on account of the three deaths was $877.41. During the next eleven years 10 Senators died, and no charge was made against the contingent fund in any of the cases but one, and that amounted to only $682.75.

Down to the year 1847, 48 Senators had died, and in only 11 cases did their deaths occasion any outlay from the Senate contingent fund.

I have procured from the Secretary of the Senate a list of the names of Senators who died while in office since the organization of the body in April, 1789, and the amounts of money expended by the Senate on account thereof. It was a laborious work to go back through the records of every session of Congress covering one hundred and six years and look up the various items. But the Secretary and his faithful assistants performed it patiently, and I have no doubt they have done it accurately, except as to the case of Mr. Malbone, which was overlooked.

This is the list, showing the names of Senators, the States they represented, the date of their deaths, and, in each case where any public expense was incurred, the amount.

UNITED STATES SENATE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., November 23, 1895.

The following is a list of the Senators who died during their term of service, showing the date of their death and the expenses incurred by the Senate in each case. It is proper to say that many of the Senators died at their home residence and during the recess of Congress:

The American people are not stingy, and they do not favor a cheeseparing policy in any case. We are a liberal people, and we are intensely patriotic. We have been taught to respect those in authority, and we believe in paying due respect to the memory of the distinguished dead. If we criticise a case of public expenditure on any such occasion it is because of what is useless in the account rather than the amount which is reasonably appropriate. And in what seem to be proper cases we will bear heavy drafts without complaint. On the occasion of Louis Kossuth's visit to the capital of our country, Congress paid him and the cause of Hungary great respect. No objection was made to the expenditure of money on account of his entertainment; but there was a protest against the pernicious application of public moneys to certain scandalous uses. And this is not to be wondered at when we read this bill of items in one account:

J. P. and M. Brown, board of Governor Kossuth and suite, having 10 parlors and 22 chambers, 13½ days, 23 persons	$3,588.00
Champagne, sherry, madeira, postage, cigars, lemonade, bar bill, washing, medicine, post-office stamps, porterage and messengers, hack hire paid at different times, telegraphs, sugar, brandy and whisky in room, porter and ale, envelopes, barber's bill, amounting in all to	658.83
Bill for the carriages engaged for the Governor and suite	319.50
	4,566.33

And in case of the death of a great American, distinguished as a soldier or a civilian, the people expect some official attention paid to it, and that, too, at public expense. In such cases it is only the abuse of discretion and the excessive charges of persons furnishing service or articles of merchandise, that develops unfavorable criticism. When President Garfield was disabled by an assassin, the country would not have been satisfied with any treatment of the case short of the utmost that could be done not only to save the man's life, but to manifest our appreciation of his great office, and to exhibit our loathing toward the wretch who attempted the taking of his life.

The aggregate expense attending the sickness, death, and burial of the President was $39,793.01. The amount might have been much larger and the people would have approved it had all the charges of persons who were specially benefited by the disbursements appeared to be reasonable.

Here is a list of the items and the several amounts paid for them:

Statement showing expenses incurred on account of the illness, death, and burial of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States, paid from the United States Treasury in December, 1882.

And a like liberal policy would be approved if applied in cases of the deaths of Senators and Representatives who had greatly distinguished themselves by long and useful service and who had been long near the people's hearts and close to the public conscience—great men to whom the country, without regard to party or sect, felt indebted. It might be, however, that more or less embarrassment would attend even the most impartial and patriotic selection in such cases. Conditions might exist which partial friends would misconstrue into a public clamor that, in fact, were no more than manifestations of local or partisan pride. To avoid even the appearance of evil, therefore, it is better to make no exceptions and to abolish utterly the custom of Congressional funerals.

It is eminently appropriate that some action be taken by every great constitutional body of large membership in case of the death of one of its members during a session. This is true, because in most if not in all cases the home of the deceased is not near the capital and within constant reach of his family, who could not therefore be always at hand in case of accident or death. The average distance of the homes of Senators from the city of Washington is not less than 1,000 miles. The average in cases of members of the House of Representatives is not so large, because, while there are two Senators from each State, the new as well as the old, Representatives are apportioned according to population, and the most populous States do not lie very far away. Seven hundred miles is about the average distance of Congressmen's homes from the capital. Some prompt and suitable proceedings ought, therefore, in every case be had when a member of either House of Congress dies when that body is in session.

But beyond what is provided for in this bill there is no need of anything. While Senators and Representatives are officers provided for in the Constitution, and are therefore officers of the United States, they are sent here by and for their respective States and Congressional districts therein. Senators are chosen by the legislatures of the States, and Representatives are elected by the people of their respective districts. They are each and all of them selected to represent their local constituencies in bodies that represent the whole country. Most of these representative men, Senators and Congressmen alike, though in general popular at home and held in high esteem by their neighbors and the whole people of their States or districts, are not known far away and never acquire national fame. The demise of such men is in all cases an event of great moment to the people whose representative they were, but the nation at large does not feel the shock and therefore does not take notice of it.

And because of the local reputation of the deceased, and because his worth as a man and the measure of his public and private virtues are best known by those who have honored him with their confidence, it would seem that, if any elaborate ceremonies are to be provided at public expense on the occasion of his death, the State legislature ought to provide a fund for that purpose.

At first the remains of such Senators only as died at the capital during a session of Congress were interred at the public expense. But latterly the custom has been for a committee, if Congress is in session, to be sent to attend the funeral, if a member of either House dies at his home or away from Washington when Congress is in session, and if the death occurs during a recess the Sergeant-at-Arms organizes a party and attends without special order.

Two instances of this kind happened during the year 1894. Senator Stockbridge, of Michigan, died at his home when Congress was in session, and Hon. Myron B. Wright, of Pennsylvania, a member of the House, died during a recess of Congress. A committee was sent, by order of the Senate, to be present at the burial services of Mr. Stockbridge, and a party made up by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives attended at the interment of the body of Mr. Wright. The public expenditures in these two cases amounted to $2,586.72—Stockbridge, $1,171.92; Wright, $1,414.80.

It will be observed that the custom is growing more expensive. And this not merely because the membership of the Senate and House is larger now than it was formerly and therefore more deaths among the members would naturally take place, but it appears also that the expenses of individual cases are much heavier of late years than they were when the custom was young.

It costs more now to send a party to witness the burial of a deceased Senator or Representative that died at home than it did, not many years ago, to start the funeral procession from Washington and bring it back.

An analysis of the report furnished me by the Secretary of the Senate shows some interesting and instructive facts. It appears that the first Senator who died during his term was William Grayson, of Virginia, whose death occurred March 1, 1790. The whole number of deaths of Senators while in office from the beginning of the Government to the present time is 107. The first time a deceased Senator's funeral expenses were borne by Congress was on the occasion of the death of John Gaillard, of South Carolina, who died February 26, 1826. Two other Senators died that year—Nicholas Van Dyke, of Delaware, May 19, and Joseph McIlvaine, of New Jersey, August 19.

The total number of Senators whose funeral expenses were provided for out of the contingent fund of the Senate is 73, at an aggregate cost of $100,234.80; the average being $1,373.18.

During the first thirty-seven years of the Senate's history 22 of its members died, and no expense was incurred by Congress on account thereof.

Within the next twenty-two years, or from 1826 to 1847, inclusive, 27 Senators died, and the remains of 11 of them were interred at the expense of the Government, at an average cost of $618.80.

The average cost of the first three Senatorial funerals was $292.47, and the homes of the deceased were in Delaware, New Jersey, and South Carolina, respectively.

The first death in the Senate that occasioned an outlay exceeding $1,000 was that of John Fairchild, of Maine, who died December 24, 1847. The total expense in that case was $1,072.25.

From 1848 to 1867, inclusive, 28 Senators died, and 18 of them were buried by Congress, at an average expense of $1,398.46.

The record from 1869 to 1894, inclusive, shows thirty deaths in the Senate, and all but five of these were the occasion of less or more public expenditure, the aggregate being $68,855.57, an average of $2,754.22.

The last ten Senatorial funerals cost $45,420.19, an average of $4,542.02.

The funerals of deceased Senators during the last ten years, from 1885 to 1894, inclusive, cost $2,069.60 more than one-half the entire expense of all such occasions during the whole period of the Senate's existence, and $4,139.20 more than all the rest from 1790 to 1884, inclusive, a period of ninety-five years.

In other words, of the 73 burials from the Senate the last 13 cost $4,139.20 more than all of the other 60.

Three cases, those of Thomas J. Rusk, of Texas, who died July 29, 1856, Andrew P. Butler, of South Carolina, whose death occurred May 25, 1857, and James Bell, of New Hampshire, whose death is recorded as having taken place May 26, 1857, cost the Government $4.50 each. These are the smallest amounts charged to account of deaths of Senators.

The largest amount expended in any one case on this account was on the occasion of the death of George Hearst, of California. The items in that case when collected and footed up show an aggregate of $21,322.55.

Among the curious things which appear from the record of these funeral expenses is that the difference in cost does not appear to be governed by the distance of the home of the deceased Senator from the capital. A few instances may be cited to make this point clear:

1846. Alexander Barrow, of Louisiana	$791.65
1847. Isaac S. Pennybacker, Virginia	772.80
1850. John C. Calhoun, South Carolina	3,106.47
1852. Henry Clay, Kentucky	5,447.02
1858. Josiah J. Evans, South Carolina	906.02
1858. James P. Henderson, Texas	541.45
1874. Charles Sumner, Massachusetts	4,687.94
1879. George S. Houston, Alabama	1,064.67
1886. John F. Miller, California	3,532.34
1891. George Hearst, California	21,322.55
1891. Preston B. Plumb, Kansas	3,082.75
1893. John E. Kenna, West Virginia	3,117.50
1894. Alfred H. Colquitt, Georgia	2,852.98
1894. Zebulon B. Vance, North Carolina	4,438.66

The Clerk of the House of Representatives found that the labor of procuring a complete list of deceased members of that body and an itemized statement of expenditures on account of their deaths was more than he could well spare from the force at his command, and I have only a list of those members who died during the years 1890 to 1894. These are the names and amounts in each case:

CLERK'S OFFICE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., November 21, 1895.

SIR: In compliance with your request for a statement showing the funeral expenses of deceased members of the House of Representatives for some years past, I give you below the amounts of the disbursements made on that account from the contingent fund of the House from December 8, 1891, to this date, that covering the period during which I have served as Clerk of the House, to wit:

Account funeral Hon. James Phelan	$345.80

In addition thereto there was paid for expenses incidental to the removal of the remains of Hon. James Gillespie, who died January 11, 1805, from the old Presbyterian Cemetery in Georgetown, to the Congressional Cemetery, and for the erection of a monument, the sum of $357. (This expenditure was made under a resolution of the House of April 11, 1892, and the act of May 23, 1876.)

Respectfully,
JAMES KERR.
Clerk of House of Representatives.

Hon. W. A. PEFFER,
United States Senate.

From this statement the following summary is made:

Deaths of members during the years 1890 to 1894, inclusive, numbered	21
Their obsequies cost the Government a total of	$26,792.67
An average of	$1,275.84
During the same four years 11 Senators died, and the average expense of their funeral ceremonies was	$4,542.02
If the same proportion between the number of deaths and amount of funeral expenses in the two Houses obtains through all the other years of the House's history, the total number of deaths among members of that body must have been about	213
And the number of those whose deaths were the occasion of public expenditures was about	145
The aggregate cost to the Government was about	$49,868.40
An average of	$343.92

This, however, is mere guesswork. In the absence of reliable figures it is impracticable to make even a satisfactory estimate. The actual expense could hardly have been less and may have been much more.

As before stated, there are two objections to Congressional funerals: One is the expense; the other is the manner of conducting them. Concerning the second objection, I have but little to say, though it is urged with more vehemence than the first. It has been frequently charged in the press that these funeral proceedings are not usually conducted reverently and with that outward deportment which, according to the average estimate, ought to characterize the bearing of eminent persons who accompany the remains of a public man and are presumed to be in sympathy with the grief of those to whom the body is to be delivered.

I have not collected, nor attempted to collect, any specific information along this line. It is not my purpose, at this time, to pursue the subject in that direction. It will be time to do that if Congress refuses to abolish the custom after its attention is called to facts of record which show how extravagant the charges are for articles used and service employed on these funeral occasions, and how fast the aggregate expense thereof is increasing.

I have examined the report of the Secretary of the Senate so far as it shows the items of expense attending the funeral services of Senator Plumb, of Kansas, and Senator Kenna, of West Virginia, and also the report of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in the cases of Messrs. Houk, of Ohio, and Chipman, of Michigan, members of the House. The aggregate expenditures in each case of the two Senators named is more than a thousand dollars less than the average in such cases during the last ten years, as will be found on comparison of totals in the list before presented.

As to the two members of the House, the average between the totals of expense in their cases is 80 per cent above the House average since 1890.

These four cases are enough to show the range of expenditures usually allowed on these funeral occasions. I shall first take up the case of the late Senator Plumb, of Kansas.

I have called attention to these items for the purpose of showing in general the character of the supplies that are purchased and the services that are furnished on the average Congressional funeral trip.

Looking over the list of forty-three items in this case, a stranger could not but wonder at not only the array, but the charges. Yet there is not one thing charged for here that is not common on all such occasions, and the charges are none in excess of what is usual. It is not the case of a private citizen who died at his home and whose remains are being disposed of by his neighbors and friends. This is an occasion when a Senator has fallen, and his countrymen, through a committee of Congress, are supposed to be paying homage at the shrine of death. All things must therefore be done elaborately, no matter at what expense, because the people are rich as well as loyal. Charges are in harmony with the other features of the proceedings. Barbers, undertakers, florists, hotel keepers, railroad managers, all perform their work and make their charges on the same grand scale. The public Treasury is, by common usage, treated as a legitimate subject of plunder for all who wish to prey upon it.

I cite the case of Senator Plumb first, because he was my colleague, and because I looked carefully over every item in the list before approving it. One charge of $500 was cut to $150. While as a whole the bill is high, and while the charges for many of the items are excessive, the custom has been so long in vogue that one would be regarded boorish if he objected to bills that are not higher than is usual on such occasions. The best way to get rid of this sort of business is to stop it.

I now present the bill of items in the case of Senator Kenna.

The items will be found to be practically the same as those in the case of Senator Plumb.

The only comment I have to make is that Emporia, Kans., the home of Senator Plumb, is more than a thousand miles farther from Washington than is Charleston, W. Va., the home of Senator Kenna. But, as has happened in many other cases, distance does not count in Congressional funerals. It is nearly 1,400 miles to Emporia, and not to exceed 300 miles to Charleston, and yet the aggregate expense of Senator Plumb's funeral ($3,082.75) was $34.75 less than the cost in the case of Senator Kenna.

ITEMIZED STATEMENT OF FUNERAL EXPENSES OF SENATOR JOHN E. KENNA, OF WEST VIRGINIA, DECEASED JANUARY 11, 1893.

[From Report on Expenditures for United States Senate, 1893.]

Commissary supplies, meals, and lunches furnished in cars, including porterage	432.48
	1,981.48
Total	3,079.55

Official statement is $3,117.50.

I present itemized statements of charges on account of the funerals of two members of the House—Messrs. Houk and Chipman—which I referred to some time ago. Here are the items and charges in the case of Mr. Houk, of the House of Representatives, amounting to $1,845.09, though on personal examination I found enough to foot up $1,810.59.

MR. HOUK.

Transportation, Pullman service, and meals to Dayton, Ohio, and return		$937.24
Casket	$350.00
Copper lining	100.00
Silver plate	25.00
Hearse	7.00
Embalming	50.00
Cedar case	75.00
Laying out remains	10.00
		617.00
8 carriages	64.00
Funeral car and services	25.00
Brick grave and marble slab	55.00
Sexton's services	5.00
5 carriages	20.50
Railroad fare and sleeper for Byron F. Ritchie	12.25
		181.75
Carriage hire, meals en route for Congressional committee, other than buffet service		74.60
Total		1,810.59

Official report, $1,845.09.

In the case of Mr. Chipman, of the House, the Clerk's statement of the aggregate is $2,308.41. The recorded items as I have found them make a total of $2,344.40, or $36 more. At this point I think it is due to the Clerk of the House of Representatives to call attention to the fact that these various items are never found in one place in the report he makes to the body of which he is an officer, and the reason of it is that the bills are presented at different times. The bills of expense which have been incurred by different persons or different companies or different institutions are not presented at the same time or on the same date. Hence in making up the accounts the entries are necessarily made on different days, and between the presenting of the different bills other items occur, so that the following up and the accurate collecting of the various items is an enormous labor, especially when we would carry it through the whole period of our Congressional history. It is no wonder that an occasional error occurs. I make this explanation because I find in one case an item that the Clerk's assistants overlooked. The itemized statement in the case of Mr. Chipman is as follows:

MR. CHIPMAN, MICHIGAN.

One-half dozen glasses	$18.00
Special car	669.39
Pullman service and commissary supplies	492.51
Carriages	$20.00
Room, board, porters' fees, and transportation	145.75
Casket	550.00
Embalming	50.00
24 coaches	75.75
6 professional bearers	18.00
Floral decorations	75.00
Name plate	10.00
Hearse	12.00
Hearse	10.00
Hearse	5.00
Shaving	5.00
Sexton's fees	10.00
Printing	5.00
Pallbearers' invitations	5.00
Canopy at grave	10.00
Grave and decorating	18.00
Soloist and male quartette	35.00
Four clergymen's fees	40.00
Surpliced choir and organist	40.00
Personal services and attendance of undertaker	25.00
Total	2,344.40

Official report, $2,308.40.

If there be any items in this account which more than others will excite wonder, they are probably the charges of a soloist and a male quartette, $35; four clergymen's fees, $40, and a surpliced choir and organist, $40.

Without going further into details, I have shown enough to satisfy everyone who cares to consider the subject at all that the custom of Congressional funerals has grown into an abuse. It is not generally respected as a serious proceeding by the people at large. Indeed, it is hardly ever referred to in respectful terms in any case of public criticism.

But I place my objection on the broad ground that it is not a proper object of public expenditure. Nor ought the contingent fund of either House of Congress be drawn upon for such outlays. Whatever may be, and ought to be, appropriately done on the occasion of the death of a Senator or Member of the House ought to be done as a matter of public decency, and the expenses should be paid out of the public Treasury.

As to those cases where the death occurs at home or away from the capital, or when Congress is not in session, they are not matters that concern the nation so much as to justify any expenditure of public money. Whatever is proper to be done in such cases is for the people at home to do, and Congress ought not to interfere in any manner with that. If members of this or of the other House of Congress wish to attend and participate in the obsequies, at their own expense, nobody will be found to object. Such a personal sacrifice would be good evidence of a devoted friendship. Nothing better illustrates the depth of a man's convictions than that he show his faith by his works. Friendship, if sincere, does not need artificial stimulus to bring it to the surface. Grief comes from the heart—one's own heart; it does not originate in the pockets of other people. The average Congressional funeral, so it is commonly charged, is nothing more than a party of good-natured gentlemen having a good time at the public expense.

I ask the Senate to discontinue this useless and expensive proceeding by the passage of the bill now before the Senate. Since it became known that such a bill was to be introduced I have received many letters and newspaper comments in great number, all concurring in the object sought to be accomplished.

The bill is short, plain in its provisions, and it provides for everything that ought to be done to treat respectfully and reverently every case that merits the attention of Congress.

Unless some other Senator desires to speak to the bill, I ask that it may retain its place on the Calendar as the unfinished business.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand that the Senator from Kansas does not ask for action on the bill to-day.

Mr. PEFFER. No; I do not. I understand there are several Senators who wish to speak on the subject, and I do not know that they desire to do so at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). In the absence of objection, the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FAULKNER. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 1 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 16, 1895, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 12, 1895.

SALE OF INTOXICATING DRINKS TO INDIANS, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the draft of a bill prepared by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, "to prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks to Indians, and for other purposes;" which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT TESTS OF IRON, STEEL, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the commanding officer of the Watertown Arsenal of tests of iron, steel, and other materials for industrial purposes made with the United States testing machines during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the cases of L. L. Wallace, administrator, William F. Perry, Tobias Tenpenny, and Luke Lee against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution for filling a vacancy in the Board of Regents, Smithsonian Institution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than members of Congress, shall be filled by the appointment of William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, in place of Henry Coppée, deceased.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will allow me to state that it is very essential that there should be no delay in filling this vacancy. As the gentleman is aware, Professor Coppée was a member of the executive committee, and his death many months since left a vacancy which it is very important should be promptly filled. The Secretary of the Institution is very much interested in this matter, and regards it as very important that this resolution be acted upon at once. It is absolutely essential to have an executive committee all the members of which are in easy access to Washington. It is the intention for Mr. Wilson to fill this vacancy in the committee, and it is important that it should be full at this time, so that the reports may be prepared for the annual meeting. I regret that any member of this Congress should interpose an objection to deprive the Smithsonian of the services of so valuable a man as we all know Mr. Wilson to be, and I regret that objection should be interposed in a case of a member of Congress whose services has been so long and distinguished, and whom we all so much respect.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DINGLEY. Monday.

Mr. ADAMS. This is too important a matter to be allowed to pass without reference to a committee. Propositions of this kind have always been referred to the Library Committee, which acts jointly with the corresponding committee of the Senate. Questions of this kind have always been discussed in the joint committee. The appointment of a regent is a serious matter, not a thing to be done hastily; and while I am willing to concede the high character of the gentleman named in this resolution, still I must object to a proceeding not in the regular course.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to say to the gentleman that resolutions of this character have frequently been passed without reference to a committee, even though committees were organized at the time. Especially has this been the case in the Senate. Right before me, page 228 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-second Congress, second session, is an instance I will read:

Mr. MORRILL. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was to appoint a regent, and it was immediately passed, without discussion or the slightest objection. I hope the gentleman will not insist, as we have no session to-morrow and it will have to go over until Monday.

Mr. ADAMS. I must insist, Mr. Speaker, on my objection. I differ with the gentleman as to the practice of which he speaks.

SCHOONER HENRY CROSBY.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the schooner Henry Crosby, a vessel duly enrolled under the laws of the United States, and commanded by Abel T. Stubbs, a citizen thereof, was fired upon by troops of the Republic of Santo Domingo, while at anchor, flying the American flag, at Azua, in said Republic of Santo Domingo, on the 10th day of December, 1893, and members of its crew shot and seriously wounded, and property belonging to the vessel destroyed; and

Whereas the owners, officers, and crew of said vessel have petitioned the Department of State for indemnity for such injury and loss and have received no relief:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, the diplomatic and consular correspondence and the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the owners, officers, or crew, their agents or attorneys, and all other reports or correspondence relating to said attack and claim demanded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I think that should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and is hereby, requested to furnish for the information of the House of Representatives a report for the last fiscal year of the expense and emolument accounts rendered by the following officers:

Clerks of circuit and district courts of the various districts in the States and Territories; also of the courts of appeals of the various circuits and of the District of Columbia.

Also fee, salary, and emolument accounts of United States commissioners, marshals, district attorneys, and assistant district attorneys; said report to give the names of said officials and the gross amount of the emolument account returned or reported by each of said officers.

Also the total amount paid deputy marshals in each district separately, and the number of deputies in each district.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, before unanimous consent is given I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is his purpose to use the information which the resolution seeks in considering legislation looking to the salaried compensation of the clerks, the district attorneys, and the marshals of the United States?

Mr. LACEY. The purpose is to give to the Committee on the Judiciary the necessary information on which such legislation can be framed. And I may say, also, that in consultation with the officials in the Attorney-General's Office on yesterday, and with the Attorney-General himself, I find that the information called for and in the form called for has been prepared already, and can be furnished without delay or difficulty.

Mr. BAILEY. If that is the only purpose, I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. CANNON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask consideration for the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to inform the House of the total acreage of lands granted each to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway companies; the total acreage patented to each, and the total acreage selected by each but not yet patented; with information as to whether (and if so, upon what ground) he has suspended the work of the General Land Office in forwarding to the Interior Department the lists of land selected; and also, as nearly as possible, what proportion of land not yet patented, but selected by said companies for patents, has been purchased from said companies by settlers.

The SPEAKER. This is subject to objection. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been reported to the House?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy for the year 1895. I desire to state that the members of the board appointed by the House, in conjunction with those appointed by the President of the United States and the President of the Senate, have performed the duties devolved upon them by virtue of their appointments. The report which I sent to the Clerk's desk is the result of their labors and investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] presents the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy for the year 1895, which will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that report I wish to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution providing for the printing of 2,500 extra copies. I will state that very frequently this additional number has been printed, and if it is not done now the printing of it afterwards will cause an additional expense. Last year the Senate printed 2,500 additional copies for their own use, giving us none of them. I provide in this resolution that of the 2,500 copies to be printed 700 shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,800 for the use of the House. I will also state that this report contains information regarding the military academies and colleges of the principal nations of Europe—very valuable information, which has never before been printed in this country. It takes up each nation separately, describes its military institutions of learning, states the requirements of entrance, the course of study, and the character of appointments given to the graduates. It will be interesting and valuable to educators everywhere. I think this extra number of copies should be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 21) for printing extra copies of the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed, in paper covers, 2,500 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895, of which 700 shall be for the use of the Senate and 1,800 for the use of the House.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]——

The SPEAKER. Pending the question of unanimous consent the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama how many copies are provided for under existing law?

Mr. WHEELER. I think only 500.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the object of having these extra copies printed?

Mr. WHEELER. Well, it has frequently, I think, been done, and sometimes done by resolution introduced afterwards, which involves more expense. Last year the Senate passed a resolution printing 2,500 copies for their use, and we got none of them. Now, I think it would be economy to print the requisite number now, instead of printing only 500.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the gentleman limits the Senate to 700 copies, does he not?

Mr. WHEELER. Well, that is about their proportion of the number.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EXTRA MONTH'S PAY TO CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read; and pending that I desire to make a short explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution giving one month's pay to certain employees of the House of Representatives.

Resolved, etc., That all officers and employees of the House, including the Capitol police, who were employed on the 2d day of December, 1895, and who have ceased or who shall, prior to the 1st day of February, 1896, cease to be so employed, shall be paid a sum equal to one month's pay at the rate they were severally receiving on the 2d day of December, 1895; and an amount sufficient for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same to be immediately available, and to be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives. This resolution shall also include the special employees of the House, E. L. Currier and George Jenison.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to offer a few words of explanation. Mr. Speaker, I agreed with Mr. Kerr, the Clerk of the House in the Fifty-third Congress, to offer this resolution. I was informed and believed, at the time I so agreed, that it had been the general custom of the incoming House to extend this courtesy to the employees of the outgoing House. In connection with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] we have been looking up the record, and I find that it has not been so done since the Forty-seventh Congress. Therefore I think perhaps that resolution ought to go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But I desire to make this explanation because I promised to introduce the resolution, and to ask for unanimous consent. I now ask that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. How does that go to the Committee on Accounts? It proposes legislation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I suppose that is the appropriate committee. If not, the Speaker will make the necessary correction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will consider it as introduced in the regular way, and refer it to the appropriate committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the resolution provide that this amount shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. CRISP. The Committee on Accounts deals with disbursements out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It is proposed to make this payment out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. I will state to my colleague that the resolution does not so read. It makes an appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think the provision is to pay this out of the contingent fund of the House; but let the latter part of the resolution be read again. I may be in error.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that an amount sufficient for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be immediately available, and to be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DALZELL. That ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Well, let it go to the Committee on Appropriations. I was in error.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There was no objection.

LEASE OF BUILDING FOR USE OF THE DOORKEEPER.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit another resolution, and ask its immediate consideration. I do not think anybody can object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, directed to continue, for the use of the folding room of the House, the lease of the brick stable owned by the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, the rent, $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House from and after January 1, 1896, and until other provision is made therefor.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I desire, in a word, to explain the purpose of the resolution. This brick stable has been occupied during two or three Congresses as a storeroom for public documents. The lease has expired. The building is necessary to the document room, and the Doorkeeper desires authority to rerent it.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. If I remember correctly, a resolution was passed at the last session of the last Congress directing the officers to remove all these books that had accumulated in the basement rooms of the Capitol, amounting to several thousand in number; and my recollection is it was stated if that were done there would be ample room for the books that are being published every month during the year. I would like to have some information on that point.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There was such a resolution passed, but I do not understand that that has made unnecessary the continuance of the lease of this stable. The fact is, the books are there, and unless the Doorkeeper has authority to rent the building he will be bound for the rent himself.

Mr. SAYERS. I would suggest that the gentleman let the resolution lie over until we can inquire into it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Very well.

Mr. SAYERS. Better let it go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Certainly. I withdraw my request for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be so referred.

There was no objection.

ARMENIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WILSON of New York. Mr. Speaker, by request of the Central Congregational Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., one of the largest and most influential churches of that city, I send to the Speaker's desk a memorial and resolution relative to the Armenian atrocities, and ask unanimous consent that it be read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the reading of a memorial and resolution, and that they be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. Before that is done—of course we are in complete ignorance of what it is—the question arises, if that memorial is read will it be printed in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman asks permission to have it read and printed in the RECORD. If consent is refused it will not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CRISP. What is it about?

Mr. WILSON of New York. It refers to the atrocities in Armenia.

The memorial and resolution were read at length for information.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the request for unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the memorial and resolution which have been read to the House. Is there objection?

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, what is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request is that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Is it a mere memorial? I did not hear what action is proposed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that it is a memorial with a resolution attached.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I have no objection to the reference of the memorial to the proper committee of the House, but I object to its being printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and it will not be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

Also, a joint resolution (S. R. 19) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to suspend the removal of intruders from the Cherokee country until the further action of Congress.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] desires to address the House upon some topic in the President's message; and I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the President's message.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the President's message.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I desire the Clerk to read a paragraph from the President's message which I have marked in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

By command of the people a customs-revenue system, designed for the protection and benefit of favored classes at the expense of the great mass of our countrymen, and which, while inefficient for the purpose of revenue, curtailed our trade relations and impeded our entrance to the markets of the world, has been superseded by a tariff policy which in principle is based upon a denial of the right of the Government to obstruct the avenues to our people's cheap living or lessen their comfort and contentment for the sake of according especial advantages to favorites, and which, while encouraging our intercourse and trade with other nations, recognizes the fact that American self-reliance, thrift, and ingenuity can build up our country's industries and develop its resources more surely than enervating paternalism.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the President, in his annual message to this Congress, says:

By command of the people a customs-revenue system, designed for the protection and benefit of favored classes at the expense of the great mass of our countrymen, and which, while inefficient for the purpose of revenue, curtailed our trade relations and impeded our entrance to the markets of the world, has been superseded by a tariff policy which in principle is based upon a denial of the right of the Government to obstruct the avenues to our people's cheap living or lessen their comfort and contentment.

When stated concisely, this paragraph means simply that a protective tariff has been superseded by a free trade one, called by its friends a tariff for revenue only. The President gives us no information as to the practical operations or result of this new system which has superseded the old one. Disregarding the uniform custom in annual messages, he fails to state the amount of the receipts and expenditures of the Treasury for the last fiscal year, or in fact for any year. He contents himself with the declaration contained in this paragraph, which is the only reference in his message to the revenue system now in force, or as to the receipts and expenditures of the Government. He merely asserts that a "system of customs revenue inefficient for the purpose of revenue," which "impeded our entrance to the markets of the world" and "obstructed the avenues to our people's cheap living," has been superseded by command of the people.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Congress is left, therefore, to ascertain for itself as best it can the real condition of the Treasury—its receipts and expenditures—since the close of the fiscal year 1894. The President in his annual message in December, 1894, informed Congress that the deficit in the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, was $69,803,-260.58. The report of the Bureau of Statistics for 1895 shows that the deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, was $42,805,-223.18. The daily statements issued by the Secretary of the Treasury show that since July 1, 1895, to December 10 the deficit is $18,545,720.04. So the receipts of the Treasury from all ordinary sources since June 30, 1893, have been $131,354,203.80 less than its expenditures, including nothing of what may be appropriated in deficiency bills to be passed this session. By the daily statements as to the condition of the Treasury the deficit continues at the average rate of about $4,000,000 per month. In these two years of deficit there was paid each year in pensions $18,000,000 less than in 1893. The President informs us in this message that "the bonded indebtedness" of the Government has been increased $162,315,400. So it would seem that this new system of finance is not a great success, though claimed by its friends to be one for revenue only.

PROTECTIVE AND REVENUE TARIFFS.

What is the history of the old one that has been thus superseded. It began with the passage, in February, 1861, of what is known as the Morrill tariff. That was framed avowedly upon the principle that while raising the revenue necessary for the support of the Government, duties should be so adjusted as to protect American labor in its competition with the poorly paid labor of the world, and to secure as far as possible the supplying of the home market by home labor in all cases where climate, soil, and business facilities would admit of its being done to advantage.

This principle controlled in all the tariff legislation from that time until March 4, 1893. Every year after 1865—that being the close of the war—the receipts have exceeded the expenditures, and in addition to paying the current expenses of the Government two-thirds of the national debt of $2,700,000,000 in 1867 has been paid, and no money was borrowed save the $95,500,000 for the purpose of resumption of specie payments in 1879. This is a financial record unsurpassed in the history of any nation. The following table shows the excess of receipts and expenditures of the Government from 1858 to 1895 inclusive, and the amount of customs revenue each year from 1865—the close of the war period:

Year ended June 30—	Customs revenue.	Excess of revenue over expenditure.	Excess of expenditure over revenue.

Previous to 1861 the tariff of 1846 had been substantially in force, though some changes in it were made in 1852 or 1853 and again in 1857. Mr. Buchanan's Administration closed March 4, 1861, with a deficit in the Treasury every year, amounting at the end of the four years to $75,217,120. Resort was had at that time by the Democratic party to borrowing money for current expenses in time of peace. Mr. Buchanan's Administration was the last Democratic Administration in full control of the executive and legislative departments of the Government until Mr. Cleveland's, and his Administration seems to begin where Mr. Buchanan's left off. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The Morrill tariff passed by Congress in 1861 was signed by Mr. Buchanan. The leaders of the present Democratic party are loud in denouncing all protective tariffs as unconstitutional, and especially the one passed in 1890, known as the McKinley tariff, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in a unanimous opinion, declaring that act to be constitutional. The period from 1880 to 1892 under these two protective tariff systems was one of unexampled prosperity, and for development of material resources and growth of industries unequaled in any like period in the history of nations. The receipts into the Treasury for these thirteen fiscal years from the ordinary sources of revenue over and above expenditures were $1,130,557,018, and the exports of merchandise over the imports were $1,139,613,971, and the importation of gold over its export was $96,401,216. The gold in the Treasury every year of this period exceeded the $100,000,000 reserve and all gold certificates issued. For the three years 1888, 1889, and 1890 the average excess was over $90,000,000.

GROWTH OF INDUSTRIES.

The growth of the mechanical and manufacturing industries, as shown by the census of 1880 and of 1890, was more than doubled in the capital invested and the amount paid to labor, and almost double in the value of the products produced. The abstract of the census of 1890 shows in detail that the capital invested in 1890 was $3,734,202,699 more than in 1879, and there was paid to labor in these same industries $1,335,262,734 more in 1889 than in 1879, and the value of the products in these industries was $4,002,858,092 more in 1889 than in 1879. The farm mortgages created between 1880 and 1890 had been, January 1, 1890, reduced more than one-half.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

The customs receipts during this period were $177,452,964.15 in the year 1892, being the lowest, and $229,668,584.57 in the year 1890.

The following table shows the customs revenue for each year from 1888 to 1895, inclusive, and the excess of total receipts into the Treasury over expenditures:

Year.	Customs.	Excess of revenue over expenditures.
1888	$219,091,173.63	$111,341,273.63
1889	223,832,741.69	87,761,080.59
1890	229,668,584.57	85,040,271.97
1891	219,522,205.23	26,838,541.96
1892	177,452,964.15	9,914,453.66
1893	203,355,016.73	2,341,674.29
1894	131,818,530.62	*69,803,260.58
1895	152,158,617.45	*42,805,223.18

*Expenditures in excess of revenue.

Though the McKinley tariff was in force until August, 1894, yet the business of the country was so disturbed by the result of the election in November, 1892, in anticipation of the change in tariff policy, that importations for the fiscal year 1894 were greatly restricted and the home production of everything was greatly lessened. So that in all fairness in comparing the operations of tariffs the fiscal year 1893 should be regarded as the last year of the McKinley tariff. The average receipts from duties in the fiscal years 1891, 1892, and 1893 were $200,110,062.03.

FOREIGN COMMERCE.

The foreign commerce of the country under these two protective tariff laws beginning in 1861, which the President claims impeded our entrance into the markets of the world, expanded from $1,503,593,404 in 1880 to $1,857,680,610 in 1892, the largest of any year in our history. The next largest year was $1,729,397,206, in 1891—showing that there was no trouble in our entering the markets of the world. But the world has no market better than the American market. [Applause.] We have a people of 70,000,000 to-day that consume per capita more than any other people on the earth, and which doubles in numbers every thirty years. Ere the close of this century of national existence 500,000,000 of people will be dwellers upon the soil over which to-day floats the flag of our fathers—about one-third of the present population of the globe. Why should we open such a market to the products of the poverty-stricken labor of the world, thereby excluding our own labor from employment in supplying it?

BUY CHEAPEST WHERE PAY EASIEST.

One of the President's objections to a protective system is that it obstructs the "avenues to our people's cheap living." A man in the poorhouse realizes the President's ideal of cheap living, for he lives cheaper than anybody else. [Laughter.] Cheapness in articles of consumption is not always desirable. Shall cheapness to the consumer be weighed in the balance against the comfort of the home and the happiness of the fireside of the producer? Anything sells too cheap that sells for a price that will not give to the producer living wages. [Applause.] If articles of consumption can be furnished to the consumer cheaply only by reducing the wages of the laborer who produces them to the rate paid his competitors in other lands, where penury sits at their fireside and sorrowing want surrounds their deathbed, then cheapness is not a desirable object. [Applause.]

Strike from the tariff all its protective features, and the labor of this country must then stand unaided and alone in its competition with that labor of the world where homeless poverty is the sole heritage of the sons of toil. The consumer in all cases buys cheapest where he pays easiest. The state of things that gives steady employment to the laborer at the highest attainable wages enables him to pay easier, and thereby he buys cheapest, no matter what the nominal price of the article may be. Without employment he could not buy at all, and with scant employment he must buy scant. The country that produces for itself the articles consumed by its people has both the article produced and the money paid for its production, instead of having but one of these values, as would be the case in buying abroad.

COMFORT AND CONTENTMENT.

Upon the comfort of the home depends the happiness of its fireside; and by that fireside is reared the generations who are to control the destinies of the nation. [Applause.] In despotic or monarchical governments the great interest in its children is that they become good soldiers; but in a free constitutional government the great interest in its children is that they become good citizens, for upon the wisdom of their ballots rests the pillars of the Republic. [Applause.] Tariff laws affect directly the condition and well-being of labor, and if wisely adjusted will secure to it the supplying of the home market as far as possible.

Mr. Chairman, there would be no need of protection in arranging the duty on foreign imports if the laborers of this country were willing to live in the same way and to receive the same compensation as their competitors in other lands. But they are not willing to do that, and the patriotism of the country is unwilling that they should. That is the only reason why in tariff legislation it becomes necessary to guard the American producer against unequal competition with foreign products in their labor cost.

With the single paragraph I have read from the message, the President dismisses all reference to revenue or to the receipts and expenditures of the Treasury. His only recommendation for Congressional action is to convert five or six hundred millions of noninterest-bearing debt into an interest-bearing debt of the same amount on long-time bonds. [Applause on the Republican side.] A year ago his recommendation for Congressional action for the ills of the country was to allow State banks to issue a part of the circulating medium. There is no reference now to that remedy. I have no idea that this Congress or the next, or any other Congress, unless it is as overwhelmingly Democratic as this one is Republican, will retire what is known as the greenbacks into an interest-bearing debt. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have substantially the same currency to-day that has existed for years past, and so long as the receipts exceeded expenditures no inconvenience or serious trouble was experienced.

AMEND NATIONAL BANK ACT.

But it would be well to retire the Treasury notes of 1890 and the silver certificates in some way that would not contract the currency. My plan to do that is embraced in a bill offered in the last Congress and again introduced in this, the outlines of which are embraced in the following sections:

That all acts or parts of acts which require or authorize the deposit of United States bonds to secure circulating bank notes issued by national banking associations be, and the same are hereby, amended so that said associations now organized, or that may hereafter be organized, and any other association duly organized and incorporated under the laws of any State for doing exclusively a banking business, may deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, as security for circulating bank notes, in lieu of bonds, Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, or silver certificates issued under the acts of February 28, 1878, and August 4, 1886, and March 3, 1887. The association making such deposit shall be entitled to receive for each and every $100 of the par value of the Treasury notes or certificates hereinbefore described $110 in circulating bank notes of the same kind, form, and description as is now, or may be hereafter, provided in the national-bank act for circulating bank notes. On the face of each and every note there shall be engraved and printed: "Secured by a deposit of money in the Treasury of the United States."

SEC. 2. That all the Treasury notes or certificates, as aforesaid, deposited as security for circulating bank notes, and upon which bank notes shall have been issued, the Treasurer of the United States shall cause said notes and certificates to be canceled and destroyed, giving to the association making such deposit a receipt for the same, specifying the kind of Treasury notes or certificates deposited.

SEC. 5. That all circulating bank notes issued as aforesaid shall be exempt from taxation by or under Federal, State, or municipal authority.

SEC. 6. That the circulating bank notes issued under this act shall have all the legal qualities of the circulating bank notes issued under the national-bank act, and their redemption shall be made in like manner.

By this method some five or six hundred millions of Treasury notes and certificates could be converted into a noninterest-bearing debt with an indefinite time to pay and without any contraction of the currency or increasing the interest-bearing debt of the nation. By the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for October, 1895, there were 3,715 national banks in existence, with an authorized capital of $664,136,915, and 5,066 State banks, with a capital of $422,052,618, making a total banking capital of both kinds of $1,086,189,533. This plan would allow a State bank to receive circulating notes the same as the national banks do on making like deposits in the Treasury. I need not take the time of the committee in advocating the system of uniform currency and circulating medium as it exists to-day. There is no system of State bank issues, I care not how arranged, that can be made a uniform, safe circulating medium without a deposit in the United States Treasury. The present law requires every national bank to receive the issues of every other national bank throughout the country in payment of any debt due the bank. Can you pass a law requiring the State banks to thus receive the issues of any and all other State banks throughout the country without some such deposit?

This plan would leave the present national banking law just as it is, except that this kind of paper could be deposited instead of bonds for security of payment and final redemption of circulating notes. The Government would be responsible the same as now for the redemption of the currency in the hands of the people. The currency would be as now uniform everywhere, and of equal value wherever received, and would be based upon a system which would allow of necessary expansion. The character of the nationl-bank circulation would remain the same as now, except that State banks could participate in it. The advantage of one uniform rule and law against counterfeiting as it exists now saves millions of money to the people. Having given my views at the last session of Congress, somewhat at length, as to the desirability of thus amending the national-bank act I will not take up the time of the committee in its further discussion now.

GOLD RESERVE AND ENDLESS CHAIN.

The gold reserve that the President regards as a weakness in the financial management of the Government will continue such as long as money must be borrowed for the current expenses of the Government.

This "endless chain" that we hear so much about began with what appears to be an endless deficit [applause on the Republican side], and it will continue until the revenues of the Government exceed its expenditures. When that is the case why should there be any more trouble than there was for fifteen years before? As long as the revenue is less than the receipts I know of no way to keep gold in the Treasury. I know of no way in which a man can pay his debts without taking the money out of his pocket, as long as it lasts, and giving it to his creditors. If there is not enough there to pay his debts, then either he is a bankrupt or his creditor is a loser. There has been nothing in the Treasury except gold for the payment of the deficit in revenue. What was left to pay out? Treasury notes and greenbacks. That is a regular Micawber system of finance. [Laughter.] He counted his own notes as a fund for the redemption of his debts, and we are doing the same thing. Issue promissory paper to-day and say our debt is paid. It comes back for what that paper represents, and unless we have it we must go into bankruptcy.

Our paper money, substantially as we have it to-day, was no trouble to the Treasury of the United States during the time the Republican party controlled its administration. It only began with this new system, introduced with the incoming of this Administration, the same kind tried by our fathers, and it has always proved a failure. From the beginning of the Government we never have had what is called a free-trade tariff, a tariff for revenue only, that did not have the same result. Buchanan's Administration went to wreck in its finances on the same rock. Now its successor is trying the same experiment, and claims that it has done so because of a command by the people.

COMMANDS OF THE PEOPLE.

The people after two years of experience of an administration with a foreign policy of dishonor to the nation and a home policy of ruin to its industries have issued through the ballot box a new mandate with an energy and far-sweeping result that I trust the President in his official acts will not disregard, though he entirely ignored it in his message. Thirteen representatives of this once great Democratic party from 30 States of the Union are all that can speak for that party on this floor to-day. One only to speak for all New England. One for all the Pacific States. The other eleven speak for the remaining States which lie north of what used to be the old sectional Mason and Dixon's line. Thirty members sit upon this floor to-day to speak for the lion-hearted, unconquerable Republican party of the heretofore solid Democratic South. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Congressional district of the home of every Democratic Senator in the Senate of the United States from either of the 30 States referred to is represented on this floor by a Republican. What was tried in the elections of 1894?

The Democrats say the election of 1892 was a condemnation of the McKinley bill. Then was the election of 1894 a condemnation of this new bill, christened the Wilson-Gorman bill, but which the President declared was a child of perfidy and dishonor when it was laid on the steps of the Executive Mansion? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] Solid Republican delegations are now here from a greater number of States than ever before. If these so emphatic and sweeping elections were not a condemnation by the people of the legislation of the last Congress, then it was a condemnation of the Democratic party itself, and that is what I think it was. It was the Democratic party itself on trial in the late elections. For it made no difference what kind of a Democrat it was, whether a zealous or lukewarm advocate of this new system of customs revenue, or a Democrat who had opposed it, the political cyclone swept away all kinds of Democrats alike.

The Democratic party was on trial in the elections of last year, and the people issued a new mandate. Before the election leading Democrats, including the President, proclaimed that their legislative acts in the last Congress were only steps in the right direction, which they proposed to continue until the last vestige of protection was swept from the statute book. The new command of the people comes to-day: "Not another step in that direction." [Applause on the Republican side.] It is a fair warning for the Democratic party to retire and make repairs for the future. Hoping that the President in his official acts will not disregard this new command, though he entirely ignored it in his message, I trust when he has leisure to attend to public affairs he will give heed to it. [Laughter and loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, December 16, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BINGHAM: A bill (H. R. 1408) supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor and providing pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1409) authorizing the purchase of additional lots of ground adjoining or adjacent to the post-office building in the city of Philadelphia, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1410) to amend the act approved February 14, 1885, entitled "An act to authorize a retired list for privates and noncommissioned officers of the United States Army who have served for a period of thirty years and upward"—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1411) authorizing the establishment of a range-lights station at Maurice River, Delaware Bay—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1412) for a steam light vessel at Overfalls Shoal, New Jersey—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1413) for a relief vessel for the Fourth light-house district—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1414) to establish the Mahon River light station, Delaware River, on a new site—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1415) to authorize postmasters at money-order offices to redeem postage stamps—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1416) raising the Christiana light station, Delaware, to the fourth order, and authorizing a post light—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1417) to prevent the establishment of letter boxes for the receipt or delivery of certain mail matter in premises not occupied by post-offices or branch offices—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1418) regulating rates of postage on second-class mail matter at letter-carrier offices—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1419) to allow the Postmaster-General to grant leave of absence with full pay (in addition to the leave now granted by law) to any letter carrier or clerk in a post-office who shall be disabled by any casualty while in the performance of his duty, etc.—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1420) to amend section 3829 of the Revised Statutes—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1421) to reduce the postage on fourth-class matter—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1422) to extend the free-delivery system of the Post-Office Department, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1423) to allow postmasters in first and second class post-offices to suspend clerks and employees therein without pay, not exceeding thirty days, for neglect of duty, and for other reasons, and to furlough clerks and letter carriers—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1424) to reduce the postage on books transmitted by mail—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1425) fixing the rates of duty on importations of wool and manufactures of wool—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1426) to increase the circulation of national-bank currency and to reduce the taxes thereon—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1427) for the construction and completion of a dry dock at navy-yard, League Island, Pa.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1428) fixing the rates of duty on importations of pearl and shell buttons—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1429) to adjust the pensions of those who have lost limbs or have been totally disabled in them—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1430) directing the issue of a check, in lieu of a lost check drawn by the Chief of the Ordnance Department of the United States Army, in favor of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia—to the Committee on Claims.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 1431) to refund the outstanding United States and Treasury notes with bonds bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1432) making appropriation for site and pedestal of a statue of the late Maj. Gen. George G. Meade in the city of Washington, D. C.—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, a bill (H. R. 1433) appropriating $25,000 to the Franklin Institute, of Philadelphia, and the Purdue University, of Lafayette, Ind., for the purpose of determining the quantity of the so-called "hammer blows," "centrifugal lift, and tangential throw" of locomotive driving wheels in use on American railroads—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CUMMINGS: A bill (H. R. 1434) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to copyrights—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 16, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting five volumes of French parliamentary documents received by the United States ambassador at Paris from the Senate of France for transmission to the United States Senate; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two copies each of the acts and resolutions as well as of the journals of the third session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, as required by section 3 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma, approved March 2, 1890; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two copies each of the acts, resolutions, and memorials as well as of the journals of the thirty-first session of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, as required by section 1844 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting two copies each of the acts, resolutions, and memorials as well as of the journals of the Eighteenth legislative assembly of the Territory of Arizona, as required by section 1844 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF FISH AND FISHERIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, transmitting, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1887, a statement showing expenditures under all appropriations for propagation of food fishes during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 21) for printing extra copies of the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition, in the form of a resolution adopted at a Statehood convention held at Shawnee, Okla., praying that Congress at its present session pass an enabling act providing for the admission of Oklahoma Territory as a State; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of Typographical Union No. 87, of Houston, Tex., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PEFFER presented the petition of Joseph Moore and sundry other citizens of Saline County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation granting an honorable discharge to Michael McGrath, of that county; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying that the President and Congress of the United States take immediate, definite, and vigorous actions on behalf of the Armenian survivors; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Rachel A. Redd, of Claridon, Ohio, praying for the return of $300, commutation paid by her husband, Andrew J. Redd, for release from service in the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUAY. I present the petition of a number of merchants of the city of Philadelphia, organized as the Philadelphia Wool Merchants' Association, praying for a reenactment of that portion of the tariff law of 1890 which relates to wool and woolens. These gentlemen ask me to request the Senate that the petition be read at length and printed in the RECORD. I shall be glad to have that done if there is no objection in the Senate. If there is objection, I shall merely mention briefly, under the rule, the contents of the petition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the petition be read?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am afraid it is setting a bad precedent. What is the subject-matter?

Mr. QUAY. It is a petition praying for the reenactment of Schedule K of the late tariff act.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, December 11, 1895.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Philadelphia Wool Merchants' Association earnestly petitions your honorable bodies that without delay you reenact that portion of the tariff law of 1890 with respect to wool and woolens called Schedule K:

In order that the revenue therefrom may provide the Treasury against the deficiency which threatens the Government's financial position;

In order that the great number of farmers and woolgrowers may obtain fairly remunerative prices for their product and preserve their already depleted flocks from destruction;

In order that this country, so well adapted for raising all descriptions of wool, may produce at least a fair proportion of that needed for our home industries;

In order that the great number of toilers in our woolen factories may obtain a fair wage for their labor such as will permit them to live better than the impoverished workmen of Europe; and

In order that the mill owners may have a fair return for their capital and preserve plants from bankruptcy which have so far tided over the depression of the past two years in the hope of some return of the day of prosperity.

This petition is respectfully presented by an association of wool merchants of Philadelphia, who beg your honorable bodies, and the Executive, who has so lately assured the Congress that he is "prepared to cooperate with them in perfecting any measure promising thorough and practical relief" in what he has so aptly termed "our critical financial plight," and that he "will gladly labor with them in every patriotic endeavor to further the interests and guard the welfare of our countrymen," to thus relieve the gravity of the situation both with regard to the national finances and with respect to the great wool and woolen interests, so that both may immediately have relief and some return of prosperity.

JOHN A. LESLIE, President.
PAUL JAGODE, Secretary.

In the presence of the undersigned wool merchants of Philadelphia, who earnestly join in the foregoing petition.

COATES BROTHERS, JUSTICE BATEMAN & CO.,
PHILIP JAGODE & CO.,
And many others.

Mr. CAFFERY presented the following petition of the legislature of Louisiana; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

[House concurrent resolution.]

Whereas the streams known as the River Bœuf and Bayou Macon, in the northeastern portion of this State, are important water courses and can be made great feeders to our commerce, being already navigable a considerable distance a good portion of each year; and

Whereas there is large and important territory drained and to be benefited by the improvement of said stream, comprising large portions of the parishes of East Carroll, West Carroll, Morehouse, Richland, Franklin, Madison, Tensas, and Catahoula: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Louisiana, That we hereby memorialize Congress for relief in the premises and urge upon our Senators and Representatives at Washington to use their influence and utmost endeavors in securing an adequate appropriation for the purpose of improving the navigation of the aforesaid rivers, Macon and Bœuf, by cleaning out, dredging the shoals, and the construction of suitable locks by which deep water may be secured the year round as far up as the line of the State of Arkansas, thereby affording better drainage and increasing facilities for commerce.

Resolved further, That we deem $85,000 sufficient for this purpose, and would respectfully ask and urge the immediate appropriation of the said amount as indicated, $50,000 to be used in the improvement of Bayou Macon and $35,000 for the improvement of Bœuf River.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Washington instanter, so that this appropriation may be made and included in the budget of appropriations for rivers and harbors.

G. W. BOLTON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
H. R. LOTT,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Approved July 12, 1894.

MURPHY J. FOSTER,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy.

T. S. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CAFFERY presented a petition of sundry citizens of the United States resident in the State of Louisiana, praying the refund of certain moneys collected by the United States; which, with the accompanying exhibits, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented the petition of Lavinia E. Buchanan, of Bakersville, N. C., widow of William A. Buchanan, deceased, late private of Company E, Third Regiment of North Carolina Mounted Infantry Volunteers, praying that she be granted a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of James H. Tolly, of Bakersville, N. C., late of Company L, Twelfth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, praying that he be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Martha C. Ollis, of Mitchell County, N. C., widow of John Ollis, deceased, late of Company D, First Regiment North Carolina Volunteers, praying that she be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented a resolution of the Massachusetts State Board of Trade, reiterating its former resolutions favoring the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a memorial of the legislative assembly of Connecticut; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, GENERAL ASSEMBLY, JANUARY SESSION, A. D. 1895.

[Senate joint resolution No. 210.]

Resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to investigate concerning the case of Dorence Atwater.

Whereas there has just been brought to the knowledge of the people of the town of Plymouth, in this State, the case of Dorence Atwater, a former citizen of that town, deservedly and universally held in high estimation for his character and his conduct as a soldier in the late civil war and, under appointment by the United States, having discharged for many years acceptably to the Government all the duties of a consul at the Seychelles Islands and at Tahiti; and

Whereas it now appears that said Atwater, after having rendered services especially dangerous and highly meritorious in the late civil war, services considered at the time particularly valuable in their results to the Union cause and a matter of pride to his fellow-citizens for the patriotic sagacity, skill, and perseverance shown and success achieved by him, was pronounced guilty of a crime by a court-martial and sentenced to State prison at hard labor and confined as a felon in Auburn State Prison, from which he was discharged after two months' confinement without pardon and without any reason given in the premises: Therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in the general assembly of the State of Connecticut convened, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Fifty-fourth Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to cause the case of Dorence Atwater to be inquired into by the Fifty-fourth Congress, through a committee or otherwise, to the end that the finding and sentence in said case be annulled, and that what pertains to justice in said case may at last be done, that his name and memory may be forever relieved of the disgrace and dishonor now resting upon it.

House passed July 1, 1895.
Senate passed July 1, 1895.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, ss:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State, at Hartford, this 9th day of July, A. D. 1895.

WILLIAM C. MOWRY, Secretary.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of Charles E. White, secretary of the Groton Monument Association, and 91 other citizens of Groton, Mass., and New London, Conn., praying for the purchase by the United States of certain lots adjoining old Fort Griswold, Groton Heights, Groton, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition, in the form of resolutions, adopted by the Wholesale Grocers' Association of Quincy, Ill., praying for a reduction of letter postage to 1 cent; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying that an investigation be made into the condition of our merchant marine with a view to legislation for its revival; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the legislative assembly of California; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 13.

Introduced by committee on Federal relations February 6, 1895. Read, adopted, and transmitted to senate.

Assembly substitute for senate joint resolution No. 2, relative to the free coinage of silver.

Whereas we recognize the fact that by the demonetization of silver, and by refusal to give it equal standing in the coinage system of the United States, the material interest of the nation is dangerously impaired; and

Whereas it is recognized to be a fact that the opposition to silver coinage emanates from speculative syndicates and moneyed classes who seek to embarrass the people of the nation for the advancement of their own selfish ends; and

Whereas we entertain the firm belief that the full measure of national prosperity will never be restored until the coinage of silver is resumed in accordance with the true intent and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, and having unbounded faith in the power and ability of this nation to restore and maintain silver in its proper position alongside of gold; and

Whereas we believe that the issue of United States bonds for the purpose of maintaining a single gold standard, or any standard that does not contemplate the free and unlimited coinage of silver, is a practice fraught with the greatest danger to the stability of our institutions and the maintenance of national credit: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to earnestly and urgently advocate the immediate enactment of such laws as may be necessary to provide for the immediate resumption of the free and unlimited coinage of silver in the ratio of 16 to 1; and

Be it further resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives be requested to actively advocate the enactment of such laws as may be necessary to prevent the issue of United States bonds for the sole purpose of maintaining a single gold standard of money; and

Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to immediately transmit a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Fruit Growers' Association of California, praying for the construction and ownership by the Government of the Nicaragua Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented the following memorial of the legislature of Minnesota; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Joint resolution of the legislature of Minnesota, recommending that provision be made by act of Congress for the appointment by the President of Lieut. Col. Josias R. King, late an officer of the First Minnesota Infantry and of the Regular Army, to be first lieutenant in the Army, and to be placed on the retired list with that rank.

Whereas Lieut. Col. Josias R. King, of this State, enlisted as a volunteer in Company A of the First Minnesota Infantry on the evening of April 14, 1861, and was thereafterwards, on the 29th day of April of the same year, mustered into the military service of the United States as an enlisted man, in which service he remained, with the exception of six months after the termination of the war of the rebellion, until the expiration of the year 1870, during which period he held the rank of first sergeant of Company A, First Minnesota Infantry, second lieutenant in the same regiment, first lieutenant and captain of the same regiment, lieutenant-colonel of United States Infantry Volunteers, second lieutenant United States Infantry, and first lieutenant of the same regiment, and while so in the service participated in the first and second battles of Bull Run, in the battle of Edwards Ferry, in the siege of Yorktown, in the battles of Fair Oaks, Nelson's Farm, Savage Station, White Oak Swamp, Peach Orchard, Malvern Hill (first and second battle), Fredericksburg, Vienna, Antietam, South Mountain, Charlestown, and Chancellorsville, and in the Indian campaigns on the Arkansas and Upper Missouri rivers in the summer of 1865, and in all these battles and campaigns served with credit to himself and with such gallantry as to attract the attention of his superiors, who, for his distinguished services, recommended him for a commission in the Regular Army, which was accordingly granted in the month of May, 1866, as second lieutenant, and was afterwards promoted to first lieutenant, and served in the Regular Army in such manner as to meet the approval of all his superiors, and solely on account of the location to which he was assigned was compelled to leave the Army or sacrifice his wife to the debilitating and malarial influences of the climate, and has now reached the age of 64 years, without income or any means for the support of himself and his family: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Minnesota, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and the same are hereby, respectfully requested to use all honorable means to pass such an act as will enable the President of the United States to appoint said Lieut. Col. Josias R. King first lieutenant in the Regular Army, and place his name upon the retired list of the Army, with the pay and emoluments of that rank.

Approved March 2, 1895.

STATE OF MINNESOTA, Department of State.

I, Albert Berg, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of house file No. 339, filed in this office March 2, 1895.

ALBERT BERG.

Mr. CALL. I present a communication from citizens of the United States in the Island of Cuba, accompanied by a request that it be laid before the Senate. It is in the nature of a petition, but I suppose the names of the writers should not be communicated. It relates to the unreliability of the intelligence conveyed in the press dispatches in regard to Cuban affairs, and asserts the complete organization and success of the revolution there. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN presented the following memorial of the legislature of Wyoming; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

STATE OF WYOMING, Office of the Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of Wyoming, ss:

I, Charles W. Burdick, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 1, of the Third State legislature of Wyoming, has been compared with the original which is on file in this office, and the same is a true and correct copy of said memorial and of the whole thereof, together with the indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming. Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 23d day of February, A. D. 1895.

CHARLES W. BURDICK,
Secretary of State.

THIRD LEGISLATURE OF THE STATE OF WYOMING.

Senate joint memorial No. 1, State of Wyoming.

Memorializing Congress to allow and pay to the State the amount of money realized by the United States from the sale of sections 16 and 36, which are sold by the Government as coal lands.

Whereas by the act of admission to the State of Wyoming sections 16 and 36 in every township in the State of Wyoming were granted to the State for the support of the common schools, and by section 13 of said act of admission all mineral lands are exempted from such grant, said State being authorized and empowered to select in lieu thereof an equal amount of other unappropriated lands for the use and benefit of the common schools thereof:

Be it resolved by the legislature of the State of Wyoming, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized as follows:

That instead of the selection of lands in lieu of any of said sections 16 and 36, or any portion thereof, which shall, by reason of being coal lands, be exempted from the grant of such sections to the State, the United States allow and pay to the State of Wyoming, the same to constitute a part of the permanent fund for the benefit of the common schools of said State, any and all moneys realized and received by the United States from the sale of such coal lands located in sections 16 and 36 in any township within said State, whether the same shall be received by the United States at any time hereafter, or at any time heretofore, since the admission of Wyoming as a State.

Resolved, That a certified copy of this memorial and resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to each Senator and to the Representative in Congress from this State, and they are hereby respectfully requested to urge the necessary legislation in the premises.

GEO. W. HOYT,
President of the Senate.
JAY L. TORREY,
Speaker of the House.

Approved February 16, A. D. 1895.

WM. A. RICHARDS, Governor.

Mr. BRICE presented petitions of 60 citizens of Hannibal; of 60 citizens of Melrose; of 50 citizens of Holmesville; of 171 citizens of Massillon; of 40 citizens of Lykens; of 214 citizens of Marion; of 62 citizens of Green Spring; of 130 citizens of Osnaburg; of 150 citizens of Dayton, and of 70 citizens of Andover, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting the appropriation of moneys for sectarian purposes; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that an accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending this proposed legislation, be referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 886) to provide a home for aged and infirm colored people; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PEFFER subsequently said: I wish to ask a change of reference of a bill introduced by me this morning (S. 886) to provide a home for aged and infirm colored people. I asked that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. After talking the matter over, it has occurred to me that perhaps it had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that the change of reference be made.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the Committee on the District of Columbia, I think, have heretofore had charge of that bill, which is for the establishment of a home in the District. I am very positive, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, that I am justified in saying that such matters ordinarily go to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have no personal preference in the matter.

Mr. PEFFER. I had some difficulty in my mind in determining what committee properly had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and I conferred with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who, I believe, is the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and his suggestion was similar to that of the Senator from New Hampshire; but in conferring with the friends of the bill upon the outside I find they think, it being a national measure and one that should be more clearly and more systematically investigated, that perhaps it had better go to a committee specially interested in the subject. If it will not be offensive to the committee—and I am sure I do not intend anything of that kind to the Committee on the District of Columbia—I still ask that the bill may go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which committee I am a member, and upon the statement of the Senator from Kansas that the chairman of that committee claims that it has properly jurisdiction of this bill, I certainly am unwilling to have the reference changed, except by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. Very well. Let the bill remain where it is for the present.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 887) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant an honorable discharge to Michael McGrath; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 969) for the relief of Thomas F. O'Reilly; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 970) to remove the charge of desertion standing against John Daley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 971) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Jeremiah F. Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 972) to provide for the continuance in office of customs officers and assistant treasurers until successors shall have been appointed and qualified; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 973) granting a pension to Benjamin Cental, of Blair, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 974) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of site and the erection of a public building at Omaha, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also introduced a bill (S. 975) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers and sailors at or near the city of Blair, Nebr., and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 976) to amend sections 140 and 145 and repealing sections 143 and 144 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to Presidential elections; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 977) for the retirement of John Tempany, senior veterinary surgeon of the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ROACH (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 25) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the White Lot and part of the Monument Grounds; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 26) directing issue of Sioux scrip in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 27) granting permission for the erection of a monument in Washington, D. C., for the ornamentation of the national capital and in honor of Samuel Hahnemann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. FRYE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 28) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EMPLOYEES OF THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. PEFFER. I offer a resolution, and before it is read, inasmuch as I desire to have it referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I wish to make a very brief statement concerning it.

It is a resolution instructing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to inquire whether and by what authority the Postmaster-General levies money fines against the pay of employees in that Department, and also whether and by what authority employees of the Department are prohibited from conferring with members of Congress and suggesting legislation, etc.

This is a very important matter, and I wish to suggest to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, now that we are all together, that it involves the personal rights of a very worthy and very hard-working class of the American people. I have a letter in my hand which I received this morning; I have received a number of similar letters, and also have had a number of interviews with persons who are particularly interested in this resolution. I hope that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will take the matter seriously and act upon it with promptness. I ask that the letter and resolution be referred to that committee.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire whether and by what authority the Postmaster-General levies fines against the pay of employees of the Post-Office Department for mistakes and errors in work; and whether and by what authority employees of that Department are prohibited from suggesting legislation in their interest and conferring thereabout with members of Congress, and the committee will report by bill or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution, with the accompanying letter, will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in the absence of objection.

PAYMENT OF SUGAR BOUNTY.

Mr. CAFFERY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to report to the Senate what action has been taken in regard to the payment of the appropriation contained in the sundry civil bill, section 1, amendment 107, approved March 2, 1895, for the bounty on sugar. And if no payment has been made of said appropriation, and if the law granting said bounty has not been executed, to give to the Senate the reasons therefor.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General are hereby directed to cause a careful and thorough inquiry to be made regarding the employment of aliens in their respective Departments and to communicate the result of said inquiry to the Senate at the earliest practicable day.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 21) for printing extra copies of the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point was read twice by its title.

Mr. VILAS. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GORMAN. Under the law all such resolutions must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. VILAS. The joint resolution comes from the House of Representatives, and presumably was reported from the Committee on Printing of that House. Is it necessary that it should also go to the Committee on Printing of the Senate?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, sir. I will say to the Senator that the committee will promptly report the joint resolution.

Mr. VILAS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE PUBLIC LANDS AND THEIR WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, 6,000 copies of a paper contained in the Sixteenth Annual Report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, entitled "The public lands and their water supply," together with the accompanying maps and illustrations, of which number 1,500 copies shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Geological Survey.

EXCHANGE BETWEEN GOLD AND SILVER STANDARD COUNTRIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Nevada, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire what effect the difference of exchange between gold-standard countries and silver-standard countries has upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the United States, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I offered that resolution to bring before the Senate and the country a grave and serious situation. There has been, for causes which I shall consider later on, an awakening in the Orient to manufacturing and other industrial pursuits, which brings into competition with the Western world from 500,000,000 to 1,000,000,000 people who have been trained to industry for thousands of years and who can subsist on one-fourth of the cost of the food that Europeans can in performing the same amount of labor. Their industries, their manufactures, have at last come in direct conflict with the manufacturing industries of the Western world.

There has been much debate and much argument in the United States to show the necessity of protecting the people of this country against competition with their own race, but never until recently has the question been presented between the Anglo-Saxon and Celtic races and the Asiatics. We have in this country made most strenuous efforts to exclude the Chinese, and have so far succeeded in doing it that there are but few left; but the invasion by the Chinese themselves, with whom it has been amply shown we can not compete, is a small matter compared with the invasion of this country by their products.

The attention of the country has been recently called to the fact that Japanese agents were here offering to sell almost every description of manufactured articles below the cost of production in this country. An article was published in the Stock Report of San Francisco, a journal of repute, and extracts from it were sent East by telegraph. In order to verify the statements it contained, I sent a telegram to the editor of that journal, William M. Bunker, and received from him a telegram giving details of the operations of a Japanese agent there, and reciting the low price at which Japanese commodities were being offered in the American market. It seems to me, however, that some of the prices are lower than it is possible for the Japanese to sell commodities here. For instance, it is stated that they are offering bicycles of the first class for $12 apiece, which would be $24 in their money. I have seen publications from the manufacturers of bicycles, who say it is impossible to manufacture them at that price; but that is mere detail. The fact that a Japanese agent for large manufactories in that country is in the United States making contracts at figures below those at which Americans can manufacture the same article is the reason why I call attention to this dispatch, which I shall print in my remarks, if there be no objection.

I also hold in my hand an editorial from the Philadelphia Item purporting to be an interview with the Japanese consul-general at New York, which sets forth the operations of manufacturing establishments in Japan and their ability and purpose to undersell the manufacturers in this country.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will allow, I should be glad to hear the dispatch he referred to read.

Mr. STEWART. At the request of the Senator from Florida, I will have the dispatch read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., November 30, 1895.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART, Washington, D. C.:

The Daily Report of November 23 gave details of a Japanese invasion of the American markets. Articles of Japanese manufacture since the close of their war are being received of equal quality with American manufactured goods, and at prices so low that our manufactories of these articles must close unless relieved by Congressional action. Report stated that H. E. Reynell, of Kobe, Japan, established an agency in San Francisco, in the Crocker Building, Mr. Edward O. Burns being their agent, for the sale of Japanese manufactured goods for the purpose of underselling American products. Similar agencies are being established East and West now by representatives of Japanese houses. The agency here is now selling the best parlor matches in tin-lined box, in box and case lots of 50 gross in a case, delivered to the merchant freight and duty paid, at 30 cents per gross. He also sells doors, sashes, blinds, and all articles of wooden ware, cooperage stock, etc., of Japanese manufacture at from 30 to 50 per cent less than they can be manufactured for in this country, with all freight and duty paid by the Japanese importers; also clocks, watches, bicycles, boots, shoes, clothing, hats, caps, gloves, fancy goods, and notions on similar terms. Their agents are buying cotton-mill machinery and shipping to Japan and will take our cotton from here to Japan and send it back manufactured for less than it can possibly be manufactured in this country. They also take cargoes of Pacific Coast lumber, manufacture the same in Japan into wooden ware, etc., and return same here manufactured at 50 per cent less than our manufacturers' wholesale prices.

A meeting has been called in San Francisco for the Chamber of Commerce, Board of Trade, and Manufacturers' Association to memorialize Congress for relief. The appraiser of the port of San Francisco, in an interview with the editor of the Report, speaks of largely increased importations of Japanese goods of all kinds. He also notes a change in silk goods. They were formerly all white, but are now colored to beat the coloring of France or America.

Editor Daily Report.

Mr. STEWART. The extract from the Philadelphia Item to which I have referred is as follows:

WHAT NONFREE SILVER IS DOING.

[The Item, Philadelphia, Pa., December 14, 1895.]

The Japanese consul-general of New York says that he thinks Japan is on the eve of building up a large trade of Japanese products in the United States. He says Japan has an ample supply of low-cost coal and is buying and making the best machinery for a large export trade.

He adds that hemp and cotton carpets, wall paper, copper and bronze ware, crystal ware, silk handkerchiefs, raw silk, pongee, umbrellas, rags, beer, tobacco, coal, and matches are among the leaders.

Besides these, Japanese agents are now offering bicycles at $12.50, sashes, doors, and blinds and wool carpets at astonishingly low prices, in fact no line is now drawn limiting what that country proposes to do in selling to the United States as well as to all gold-basis countries so long as silver continues depreciated.

Take the above bicycle as an example for all the other goods. It is claimed equal to the best in this country, and at the price mentioned is delivered duty and freight free in San Francisco.

The $12.50 received for each bicycle is in gold. This is sold for silver, equaling $20 to the Japanese manufacturer. He pays $15 of his silver dollars for making, freight, duties, etc., and clears a net profit of $5 in silver.

This same method of profit is available to the Japanese for everything they are able to produce, as well as selling coal in the San Francisco market.

The consul-general says that coal would be so sold now if the ships had a return cargo.

The evidence that this movement on the part of the Asiatics is very extensive and that it will revolutionize the manufacturing of the world is abundant. Our consul at Shanghai, Mr. T. R. Jernigan, has made a report on the subject, from which I will read a portion. The report is dated August 26, 1895. The Japanese war has done much to wake up the Asiatics and produce a new industrial era. The most important clause in the treaty of April 17, 1895, between China and Japan, is the provision opening all the treaty ports of China to the Japanese for manufacturing purposes. The sixth article of that treaty reads as follows:

Japanese subjects shall be free to engage in all kinds of manufacturing industries in all of the open cities, towns, and ports of China, and shall be at liberty to import into China all kinds of machinery, paying only the stipulated import duties thereon.

The Japanese have since that time been taking occasion to establish manufactures; their agents are in China now examining the situation and preparing to go ahead. But that is not all. The Chinese are a very able people when their attention is concentrated on a subject and their energies are aroused. For patient industry they have no superior; and in any kind of industry which requires skill and patience I think they are probably superior to any other race on earth. Our consul-general gives an account of the growth of manufacturing in China and their exports of cotton. He also refers to their capacity to grow cotton, and says:

The import of Indian yarns during the past four years at Shanghai annually averages over 195,000 bales of 3 piculs each (1 picul = 133⅓ pounds), while the principal ports in the south of China have taken during the same period an average of 136,000 bales.

In the calculation there does not seem to be any apprehension as to a sufficient supply of raw material for the mills. In 1886 the export of cotton from Shanghai to Japan was 47,600 piculs, and the total export 278,600 piculs. In 1894 Japan took 576,000 piculs, and the total amount of cotton which left Shanghai was 930,400 piculs. It may be noted that the large increase in the exportation did not increase the price of cotton, and this may confirm the opinion among business men here that the Chinese are prepared to extend the area of the cultivation of cotton in proportion as the demand arises. Along the Yangtse Valley the soil available for cotton cultivation appears as limitless as the supply of labor in China appears inexhaustible. It is seen, after supplying the local demand, what a large quantity of cotton was exported during the past year, and it is estimated that this exported cotton would run 360,000 spindles in addition to those already at work.

There are 3 cotton mills now at work here, with, in all, 66,200 spindles, and 3 more, with 49,000 spindles, about to begin operations. Adding these to the 3 the plans or outline of which are now before the public, and which have been referred to, there will, ere a great while, be 9 cotton mills in full operation, with a total spinning capacity of 265,200 spindles.

That is in Shanghai alone, but Japan began before China, and the development in Japan is much more remarkable. China, with a capacity to produce an unlimited supply of cotton, is just waking up. After reviewing the history and growth of manufacturing in Japan, our consul-general says in regard to the cotton industry in that country:

The rapid progress of the industry is evidenced by the fact that there are in operation and in course of construction 48 factories, aggregating 819,115 spindles, of which 580,564 are in actual operation. Consular Report for November.

In a dispatch from London, which was printed in the New York Sun of the 14th instant, I find that they have largely increased their manufactures since that date. A deputation of people from India petitioned the secretary for India to have the duties on imports removed, but they got no encouragement, and were very much discouraged. The dispatch from London goes on to say:

When the members of the deputation opened their newspapers the next morning—

After this interview—

they had the further discomfort of finding cheek by jowl with the report of their own despairing speeches to the secretary of state, a statement respecting Japan's cotton trade made to a Manchester reporter by Mr. Sugihara, the European representative of the famous Imperial Spinning and Weaving Company of Japan. This gentleman, who is fully qualified to talk on the subject, bubbled over with cheerfulness, and with good reason, for the trade of Japan is extremely busy, and money is being made rapidly. It seems that there are at present 57 cotton mills, representing 838,000 spindles, working in Japan, and it is expected that in about fifteen months from now there will be 700,000 additional spindles going. A good many Lancashire people have found some comfort in the fact that the exports of cotton yarn from England to Japan increased from 5,316,582 yen in 1892 to 7,288,699 yen last year. But these figures are evidently delusive, for the yarn in question, according to Mr. Sugihara, consisted chiefly of the higher grades, which the Japanese are not yet able to manufacture in sufficiently large quantities. But evidently they intend to supply themselves just as soon as they possibly can.

Here is something for Americans which, it appears, will not be so cheerful when the facts are known with regard to China:

American cotton growers may find comfort in the admission that all attempts to grow cotton in Japan so far have been unsuccessful. The native-grown cotton is of a very poor quality and not long in staple, and even unfit for mixing with American cotton.

The consular report from which I have read states that the soil for growing any kind of cotton there is as good as any in the world, and that the only difficulty with Chinese cotton is that they place the plants too near together, so that the staple is not so strong as the American staple. But whenever they learn the mode of raising cotton and plant it sufficiently far apart to allow it to mature, it is absolutely certain, according to these reports, that they have an unlimited area of country upon which to produce it.

Although this question has not attracted the attention of the American people to any great extent, it has been considered at large by the English, and I presume that many of the Senators have seen the volume containing the prize essay which was written at the suggestion of Sir Henry M. Meysey-Thompson, who himself wrote an article.

The essay of Consul-General Jamieson, at Shanghai, took the prize, and it is so instructive that it ought to be read by every American. It is too lengthy for me to read the whole of it in the hearing of the Senate, but I ask that the prize essay, which is Mr. Jamieson's, be printed as a part of my remarks.

BIMETALLIC PRIZE COMPETITION.

[Paper submitted by George Jamieson, H. B. M. consul-general, Shanghai, China. Winner of the prize.]

Viewing the world as a whole, the observed facts during the past twenty years may be stated as follows:

1. Prices (wholesale) of nearly all commodities have fallen in gold-using countries. This fall coincided roughly, step by step, with the fall in the gold value of silver up to the end of 1892. Since that date silver has fallen more rapidly than commodities, but the latter appear to be still falling.*

2. Wages, rents, and taxes in gold-using countries have not varied, or have varied only within narrow limits, due to temporary and local causes. Agricultural rents should perhaps be excepted, but these are subject only to periodical revision.

3. Retail prices (into which wages, rent, and taxes enter largely) have not fallen to the same extent as wholesale prices; in many cases they have not fallen at all.

4. Prices (wholesale) of all commodities in silver-using countries have remained approximately steady during the period, and this whether the articles were produced in the country itself or imported. In the case of articles imported from gold-using countries, however, there has been, since the middle of 1893, a rise in silver prices corresponding to the divergence between silver and commodities noted in No. 1.

5. Wages, rent, and taxes have not varied in silver-using countries, or have varied only within narrow limits, and from causes unconnected with the relation of gold to silver.

6. Retail prices in those countries have not varied, except in the case of articles purchased retail in gold-using countries, which have risen in proportion to the rise in gold.

In so far as these propositions refer to facts observable in England, it is unnecessary to offer any remark. With regard to prices and wages in silver-using countries, especially the Asiatic countries, which are by far of the greatest importance to us, I would refer to the following publications:

Prices and Wages in India. Statistical Department, Calcutta, 1893.

Prices of Commodities in China. Consular reports. Miscellaneous series, No. 305, 1893.

The various statistical publications of the Chinese and Japanese Governments. It is impossible in this short paper to do more than indicate the data.

The first question is, In what way and to what extent have producers in England suffered loss by the demonetization of silver?

The loss to producers is the lowered value of their produce, while wages, rents, and all outgoings remain the same as before.

What, then, are the causes which have contributed to lower the prices of commodities in England and other gold-using countries, especially of agricultural produce?

Any alteration of prices must be due to causes affecting the demand, or to causes affecting the supply, or to changes in the currency itself.

It will readily be admitted that there is no falling off in the demand. The world, generally, is growing in wealth and population, and so far as demand alone is concerned prices should be rising. The cause or causes must therefore be sought in the other two elements.

The causes are, I would submit, the following, and I enumerate them in what I consider the order of importance as affecting agricultural produce, beginning with the one which has the least effect:

1. The first is cheap ocean freights and a lessening of cost of production through improvements in machinery, new chemical discoveries, and other scientific advances.

2. The appreciation of gold, consequent upon the demonetization of silver.

3. An enlarged area of supply consequent on the relative cheapness of silver to gold. As silver prices in Asiatic countries have not risen, the produce of these countries can be laid down in England at almost Asiatic prices.

I shall briefly remark on each of these in order.

1. Lowered cost of transport and production. This cause is often put forward as being the principal element in the case and it is necessary to notice it, as it has doubtless had some effect. But it may be pointed out that this cause, or set of causes, rather, had been in operation long before 1873, and did not prevent a great rise of prices between 1850 and 1873. Had these been the only agents working for a fall, all other things being equal, though in some commodities the fall might have been considerable, it is very improbable that prices all over would have been reduced more than a few points, possibly 3 to 5 per cent.

2. The appreciation of gold. It will readily be admitted that if gold were the only currency in the world a sudden augmentation or diminution of the mass by, say, one-half would raise or lower prices in nearly the same proportion. Now, when gold and silver circulated side by side at a fixed ratio maintained by the open mints of the Latin Union the metallic medium may be deemed to have been, for all practical purposes, either all gold or all silver. For example, suppose there are x ounces of gold in circulation as currency in in the world and y ounces of silver, and that 1 ounce of gold exchanges for 16 ounces of silver; then the metallic medium, in terms of gold, would be $\left(x+\frac{y}{16}\right)$ ounces, and in silver would be $(16x+y)$ ounces. The two terms would be perfectly interchangeable and the world might be said in effect to be monometallic. Prices in gold would adjust themselves in relation to the mass $\left(x+\frac{y}{16}\right)$, and prices in silver in relation to the mass $(16x+y)$, and how much was x and how much was y would be perfectly immaterial. Relatively to one another the volume of either might vary indefinitely without having any effect upon prices, which would vary only in relation to the mass of the two.

Such in effect was the state of the world up to 1873. The value of the whole of x was then, as we know, approximately equal to the whole of y; but that was quite accidental, and had not always been so.

By the breaking of the bimetallic link, the silver-using and the gold-using portions of the world parted company. In the gold-using portion prices began to adjust themselves in relation to the mass x, and in the silver-using portion in relation to the mass y, or, to speak more correctly, in relation to that mass of y which, for the time being, entered into their currency.

Now, had the two halves of the world been approximately equal in wealth, population, and extent of commerce, the adjustment might have been effected without any great disturbance of prices. One would have parted with its gold and the other with its silver, as a fair exchange, and no harm would have been done to anybody.

As a matter of fact, however, the two halves were very unequal, the gold-using half being immensely superior, and, moreover, this half was owner of a great part of the floating silver and of the silver-producing mines. Anxious as gold countries might be to get rid of their surplus silver, they would not part with it for nothing; and ready and anxious as silver-using countries might be to get silver, they could only get it for value of some sort, either by way of loans or in settlement of the annual balance of trade. This is a process that takes time. Silver-using countries for the most part are making additions to their stock of silver year by year, but they are absorbing it only slowly. Consequently prices in those countries conform themselves not to the whole mass of y in the world, but only to that part of it which has found its way into their circulation.

I may remark here in passing that this seems to explain quite satisfactorily how it is that prices and wages have risen so little in those countries, contrary to what was generally expected. In India, where the additions to the currency have been considerable, there has been some rise in the price of food and wages, particularly in those classes of skilled labor which the new industries have called into existence. So in Japan the same thing may be observed in a smaller degree. In China, on the contrary, there has been no import of silver to speak of, and no change whatever in prices and wages. Nor is there likely to be any material change in this respect, whatever the relative value of gold and silver may be; though, of course, the lower silver goes the easier in a way will it be for China and the other silver countries named to get it.

In gold-using countries, on the other hand, which have voluntarily restricted their circulation to gold, inasmuch as the mass x is manifestly insufficient to carry the commerce and industries formerly borne by x plus a considerable portion of y, prices, of course, have fallen. The quantity x has to be spread over a greater area, and as the annual additions are only sufficient to repair waste and to meet the increased demand due to the natural growth of trade, the value necessarily appreciates.

What the exact percentage due to this cause may be I do not venture to attempt to estimate. Whatever it may be, it ought to affect all commodities alike, and also, though more slowly, wages.

3°. The other cause which I have named has been and continues to be the principal factor in cheapening the prices of produce, especially produce of the cereal class.

A very few words will suffice to make this clear. In the years preceding 1873, when the rupee was at 2s. nearly, the price of Indian wheat in Bombay was approximately 10s. per hundredweight, and the Gazette price of English wheat in London was about 54s. per quarter, equal to 12s. 4d. per hundredweight. Allowing for quality and costs of transport, these prices may be deemed equivalents. When the rupee exchange fell to 1s. 6d., Indian wheat, the silver price of which in Bombay has with temporary fluctuations, remained constant,* would cost in Bombay about 7s. per hundredweight and could be laid down in London for something like 8s. 6d. All the other sources of supply remained open as before, the supply for the time being was greater than the demand, and consequently the price fell to the level of the lowest market. Again the exchange value of the rupee falls to, say, 1s. 1d. Indian wheat can now be laid down in London at nearly half the sterling price of 1873 (costs of transport having also in the meantime been greatly reduced), and consequently the price of wheat all over falls to a corresponding point.

This is a fair illustration of what has been going on all over the world. We draw our supplies from all countries wherever they can be procured most cheaply. By each successive drop in the gold value of silver, a greater and greater amount of produce has been admitted from India and other silver countries, and always at a cheaper rate. Had the rupee retained its old value of 2s., it is perfectly certain that no wheat could be imported from India at present rates. There is no reason to suppose that the rupee price in Bombay would have been materially different from what it has been. Had the gold value of the rupee not fallen, the area of grain supply would never have widened as it has done; demand and supply would have been more evenly balanced, and the variations in price would have been confined within small limits.

The same reasoning that applies to grain applies to every other article that can be supplied freely from silver-standard countries. The silver prices in those countries have, as the experience of twenty years has shown us, remained approximately steady, and necessarily the gold price has fallen. In no article, however, has the correspondence between the price of silver and the price of the article been so complete as in grain. In 1873, when the price of silver was 60d., wheat stood at 54s. To-day silver is 28¼d. and wheat 24s., being a drop in the one case of 52.5 per cent, and in the other of 55.6 per cent.

It is simply the old law of supply and demand. Increase the area of supply, and you have, for the time being, the supply outrunning the demand. With an excessive supply the cost of production in the cheapest area must determine the price of the whole. So long as Indian wheat can be laid down at 23s. a quarter it is impossible for English farmers to get a higher price, quality for quality. India by itself, of course, could not provide enough wheat to supply the whole English demand, but that is not the point. All the other sources whence England drew her supplies before the fall in silver still continue to send wheat forward, and it is the cheap rate at which the excess supply from India and other silver countries is offered that governs the market. The lower silver goes the cheaper and cheaper does this excess supply become. And there is no help for it, until either silver begins to rise again or until some portions of the earth are thrown out of wheat cultivation and the demand again overtakes the supply.

But it may be said, granting that the cheapening of produce is hard on the agriculturist, it must be a very good thing for the country at large, especially for the manufacturing portion, who get the same wages, and therefore can live so much better. This seeming prosperity, however, can be but short-lived, for—

II. The rise in the value of gold holds out an immense temptation to the capitalists of silver countries to develop their coal mines, and to erect machinery for the purpose of supplying themselves and other silver countries with the manufactured articles which this country has long been in the habit of supplying them with.

The inducement to this lies in the fact that wages in all silver-using countries, formerly cheap, have now, by the fall in silver, become 50 per cent cheaper relatively to gold wages, or, to put it in a different form, that wages in goldusing countries have, through the appreciation of gold, become 100 per cent dearer than they were relatively to silver wages.

Prices of commodities regulate themselves automatically and from day to day. Given an equilibrium of prices at any moment between a silver-using and a gold-using country any subsequent fall in silver must have one or other of two results—either the gold price must fall, or the silver price must rise. The exchangeable value of any article is, within a certain limit, representing costs of transport, necessarily the same all the world over. A bale of cotton, for example, has the same exchangeable value in Liverpool, Bombay, or New Orleans, allowing for a certain fixed margin, representing costs of transport, merchants' profit, and duty, if any. In bulky articles this margin is, of course, considerable, but that does not affect the principle. Whenever the article for any reason becomes cheaper in one place than in another, there is a profit in exporting it. A flow sets in from the cheaper to the dearer until the ordinary equilibrium is restored.

With wages, however, it is different. The price of a day's labor in Bombay bears no relation to the price in Liverpool, even assuming the quality to be equal. If, indeed, we could import a cargo of coolies as easily as we import a bale or cargo of cotton, the adjustment would be rapid. But the standard of wages in any country is regulated on very different principles. The law of supply and demand, which governs wages, is not international, like the law for commodities, but national, or even provincial. And in England, where the rights of labor are so well guarded by trades-unionism and a sympathetic legislature, even the law of supply and demand has not free scope. An employer of labor must pay the recognized wages or close his mill. Adjustments in the direction of a fall can only be brought about by concerted action, and usually after a strike or lockout, or other painful and expensive process.

Let us see now how these principles work out in our trade with silver, using countries, say China, to take a familiar example.

The result of a fall in silver must be, as I have said, that either the silver price in China must rise or the gold price in England must fall, or else it must be partly the one and partly the other. An English merchant who ships cotton manufactures to China can only do so on terms that pay in the long run. If the buying price in Manchester keeps firm, he must get such a higher silver price in China as will counteract the fall in exchange. If silver falls 10 per cent he must demand a 10 per cent higher silver rate, other things being equal; if the Manchester market falls 10 per cent he will be able to sell at the old silver rate, or if the Manchester market falls 5 per cent he will be content with a 5 per cent rise.

The observed course of prices during the twenty years up to the end of 1892 has been that gold prices have fallen and silver prices have remained steady. Since the beginning of 1893, however, there has been a change. The Manchester price has been steadier, and consequently the silver price has risen. The following table, compiled from the published market reports in Shanghai, shows the variations in silver prices of Manchester goods for the last fourteen years. The prices of 1882 are taken as 100:

1882	100	1889	100
1883	98	1890	95
1884	99	1891	97
1885	99	1892	99
1886	99	1893, June	115
1887	103	1893, December	139
1888	108	1894, June	138

The rise, as will be seen, was as much as 38 per cent. Possibly this will not be maintained, but undoubtedly a very considerable rise, which looks like being permanent, has been established.

Let us consider, first, the effects when the gold price falls, and by consequence the silver price is steady.

Suppose two cotton mills working, the one in England and the other in Japan or China, and competing with one another for the sale of their productions, and contrast the position of the two in 1873 and in 1893. Let us assume that in 1873 they were competing on even terms—that is, that each realized to the owners the same profit. In 1894 each employs the same amount of labor as it did in 1873, which the English pays for in gold at the old rates and the Japanese in silver, also at the old rates. The Japanese mill owner still pays for his men, as he used to, 18 to 20 cents a day, and for his women 8 to 10 cents a day. In 1873 that meant 9d. to 10d. per day for men and 4d. to 5d. for women. Now, it means just one-half—that is, 4d. to 5d. and 2d. to 2½d. Multiply this over 2,000 mill hands and see what the saving will be on labor alone. But this is not all. The same advantage accrues on the coal bill. Japanese coals cost them, say, $4 to $5 a ton, which meant 16s. to 20s. They still can be got at $4 to $5 a ton, but that now only means 8s. to 10s. The same thing applies to rent, wages, taxes, and all fixed charges whatsoever. They are all payable in silver and have nowise varied with the rise in gold. Only in the single item of raw material is the old equality maintained. Both are free to buy that wherever they can find it cheapest on the world's market, the only advantage being proximity to the best source of supply and consequently economy of transport.

Now, so long as the gold price went on falling and the silver price consequently kept steady, there was no great manifest advantage resulting to the Japanese manufacturer from a fall in exchange. He continued to get the same prices for his products, and his outlay was the same, year by year, both being in silver. Any improvement he could effect by economy of management or by getting his raw material cheaper would be so much extra profit; otherwise his position was unaffected. In any case exchange fluctuations would not trouble him.

The English manufacturer, on the other hand, has to meet the same fixed expenditure from ever-decreasing returns. He is able to buy his raw material cheaper, owing to the general fall in commodities, but his wages bill, his rent, his interest on borrowed capital, his rates and taxes, have all to be met as before. His profits begin to dwindle. It is only by the greatest economy of management that he can keep open at all. The best mills only manage to pay a fair profit; the worst struggle to the verge of bankruptcy, always hoping for a turn of the tide, and finally are forced to close.

Suppose, in the second place, that the silver price rises, and, as a consequence, the gold price remains steady.

The gold manufacturer is, for the time being, in an easier position. His returns do not fall off, and, though his expenses are the same, he is in a position to profit by any economy of manufacture or management.

But the silver manufacturer is, so to speak, on clover. All his working expenses are on the old scale, and he is thus a clear gainer by the extra price he gets for his products. If silver prices have risen, say, 10 per cent, his profits will be increased by just 10 per cent on his turnover. The natural result of this will be to attract more capital, more mills will be built, and the output will increase. Competition will lower prices, and the gold manufacturer will again be driven into a corner.

Whatever happens, the manufacturer in the silver-standard country has a great advantage, and simply for this reason, that he can obtain his labor at half the cost relatively to gold wages, which he formerly paid. And this advantage must remain to him (unless silver can in the meantime be brought back to something like its old value) until either wages in gold countries have fallen 50 per cent or till they have risen 100 per cent in silver-using countries, or till some common meeting ground has been found between the two. In other words, the old equilibrium will not be restored until the standard of living and comfort among the working classes in England has greatly fallen, or till the standard in silver-using countries has greatly risen.

There is only one item that militates against the manufacturer in silver countries, and that is the enhanced cost of his new machinery. It so happens that at present all, or nearly all, manufacturing machinery has to be procured from England or Europe, and the lower silver goes the more of it do Eastern manufacturers require to purchase this portion of their plant. As to this I would only make two remarks. In the first place, the gold price of machinery has itself greatly fallen with the general fall in prices. In the second place, the dearer machinery is the better will it pay silver capitalists to make that, too, in their own country.

In the foregoing discussion the form of industry specially in view was the manufacture of textiles; but it will be apparent that the same argument applies to the making of machinery and, indeed, of almost every article which we have been in the habit of supplying silver countries with. In all industries where rough mechanical labor forms a principal ingredient there is an obvious advantage. The building and repairing of ships might be quoted as an instance, and it is worthy of note that at the last annual meeting of one of our steamboat companies the chairman informed his shareholders that a large saving had been effected by having their ships docked in the East instead of in England.

The same stimulus is given to open coal mines and to develop the natural resources of those countries. If native and foreign coal, twenty years ago, sold at about equivalent rates, the former would be to-day some 50 per cent cheaper, simply through currency changes. And, as a matter of fact, it is now well known that the whole trade of the East is supplied by Japanese and Chinese coal. The former, indeed, is being sent to San Francisco and Bombay, and the time may not be far distant when it will be sent through the canal and even to England itself.

III. The result of all this must be that in the competitive manufacturing industries of the world the divergence of value between gold and silver will inevitably lead to a gradual transfer of the seat of all the great manufactures from gold-using to silver-using countries, and, if England persists in excluding herself from the benefits of an abundant supply of the international media of exchange, to the ruin of our national industries.

As competitors with one another for the sale of their products on the world's market, the nations that can for any reason produce most cheaply are bound to win in the long run. Hitherto we have been able to do this from a combination of causes. Cheap iron, cheap coal, scientific improvements in machinery, skilled workmen, and economy in the combination of labor have for a long time enabled us to maintain an industrial supremacy and yet to pay our workmen higher wages than were paid in any other country; and had this currency trouble never arisen, there is not the least doubt but that we should easily have held our own.

But the momentous economic change implied in the divergence of the old value of gold and silver by as much as 50 per cent has entirely altered the conditions. Coal is not any longer relatively cheap in England, nor is iron. Labor is 100 per cent dearer in relation to silver wages than it was. We have no monopoly of scientific machinery. Oriental nations can buy the best that is produced, and they can engage skilled workmen to teach the natives how to beat us at our own trade.

And though I have insisted on the element of wages as being, as I believe it is, the most important factor in the case, it is not the only advantage that silver-using countries have. Rents, taxes, rates, and all fixed obligations whatever are light and easily discharged, whereas in gold countries they are heavy, and tend to become heavier with every further appreciation of the metal.

The consequence of all this is what might be expected—while old-established industries in England are in many cases barely paying expenses, new and rival industries in the far East are springing up broadcast, and, in spite of inexperience and extravagance of management, are paying handsome returns to their owners.

In the report of the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, dated May 5, 1894, the following statistics are given:

The first spinning mill in Japan was erected in 1863, with 5,456 spindles.
At the end of 1883 there were 16 mills, with 43,700 spindles.
At the end of 1888 there were 24 mills, with 88,140 spindles.
At the end of 1892 there were 39 mills, with 403,314 spindles.
At the end of 1893 there were 46 mills, with about 600,000 spindles.

The same report adds, as still more rapid increase is expected in the near future, large orders, it is known, have been placed for more machinery, some for yarns of the finer qualities.

In the consular report on trade at Kobe, for 1892, a return is given of the dividends paid during the preceding twelve months by 21 mills in Osaka, the average dividend was 18 per cent, the highest being 28 per cent and the lowest 8 per cent. The dividends for 1893 as reported from time to time, in the Japan newspapers, appear to have been equally good or better. According to a recent number of the Japan Gazette, 11 mills, whose names are given, paid an average dividend of 16 per cent for the first six months of 1894, as compared with 12 per cent for the corresponding period of 1893.

Compare this with the account of the cotton trade in England, as given in the Economist of February 17 of this year. I can not afford room to quote passages, but, briefly, the balance sheets of 93 spinning companies in Oldham show a net total loss of £72,768 in 1893, against a like net loss of £104,664 in 1892. At the end of 1890 only 8 of these companies had adverse balances, and these amounted to only £8,412; at the close of 1891, 49 companies had adverse balances, amounting to £142,767; and at the close of 1893, 63 companies had realized a total loss of £366,800 on their working account.

Surely there is something seriously alarming in these figures. Have our manufacturers, with all their accumulated wealth of experience, become so effete that they allow themselves to be beaten at their own trade by amateur spinners in Japan? Or is it not that there is some enormous difference in the economic conditions of the two countries, which enables the Eastern manufacturer to win without effort, while the Western is struggling his hardest to get even a place in the race.

It has not unfrequently been said that it is some consolation to us, in the midst of all our depression of trade, to find that other countries, such as Germany and the United States, are in an equally bad condition. But I would venture to suggest that this exactly emphasizes the present contention, viz, that the countries that are suffering by reason of the fall in silver are the gold-standard countries, and those that are reaping the benefit are the silver countries.

If India is pointed to as a silver country that is in an embarrassed condition, I would reply that the whole of her trouble comes from the fact of her owing a large foreign debt in gold, which is quite accidental. Had her debt been payable in silver, as it might have been, and but for her relation to England probably would have been, she would now be in an excellent position. Taxation, in that case, would have been light; trade and manufactures would have been increasing, as they are, and all circumstances would have been favorable to the rapid accumulation of wealth.

China, which has long lagged behind in the industrial race, is also waking up to the situation. At the present moment three large factories are being erected at the port from which I write, covering many acres of ground, and before another year is out two or three hundred thousand spindles will be at work. That the ordinary Chinese coolie can be readily converted into an efficient mill hand has been abundantly proved. His patient endurance of labor is well known, as also his frugal habits. The present rate of wages, with which he is well content, may be put, in English money, at from 3d. to 5d. per day. The supply of labor is so enormous and the extent of the country is so vast that many years must elapse before there can be any material rise in wages.

But it may be urged, granting that India and other Eastern nations can make their own coarser and commoner yarns and cloths, the competition is after all confined to these grades, and they can not touch us in the finer qualities. It is no doubt true that hitherto the competition has been mainly in the class of goods mentioned, but there is no reason whatever why it should be confined to that. If there is any force at all in the argument adduced it extends to all industrial operations whatever. The only reason why Eastern mills have hitherto devoted themselves to the lower counts of spinnings is that native cotton is most suited for this quality and that the greatest profit was to be made in this branch of the industry. But there is no reason why American and Egyptian cotton should not be imported when required, as it is imported into England. No doubt a good many years will elapse before these Eastern mills can oust us from the position we now occupy as manufacturers of the medium and finer fabrics, but that things are tending that way there can be no doubt. Mr. O'Conor, assistant secretary to the Government of India, in his review of the trade for 1892-93, says:

"The influences that affected the market for yarns affected also the market for piece goods, which continue to exhibit a nonprogressive character. The trade in unbleached goods is smaller than it has been since 1883, and in neither white nor colored goods is any advance apparent for many years. It must be inferred that, as suggested in the Review of Trade for 1890-91, imported piece goods are gradually being superseded by local manufactures."

And again, page 36—

"There is no doubt, looking at the course of trade over a series of years, the competition of Indian mills is telling on the import of Manchester goods. The mills are gradually beginning to make the medium class of goods, which form the bulk of the imports, and they are also beginning to bleach and dye their goods."

The process described by Mr. O'Conor will be hastened by the development of yarn spinning in the far East. The principal outlet for Bombay yarns has been China and Japan. As these markets are closed to them, as they will be in a few years by the progress of local mills, the Bombay mill owners must devote themselves more and more to the medium and finer kinds of cloth, which in turn will oust the Manchester products.

But the object of this paper is not to show the rate of speed at which these changes may be expected to arrive, but to show the tendency and drift of things as the inevitable consequence of the monetary disturbance. There are, of course, other elements that count, and which may for a period postpone the catastrophe or mitigate its effects. Intelligence, organization, abundant supply of capital may enable a manufacturer to hold his own or even to succeed against economic advantages favoring his competitor. England has all these on her side, and doubtless will make a good fight for it.

But our manufacturers are fighting against odds. They are handicapped in the race, and many changes and adjustments are inevitable. Many forms of industry will have to be abandoned altogether, and though new forms may take their place, much capital will be lost and much suffering entailed.

But why should our people be handicapped? What national advantage can be shown at all commensurate to the great evils that are evident? It has, unfortunately, become ingrained in the English mind that gold monometallism is inseparable from our national prosperity. But should we not have prospered all the same up to 1873 had we been bimetallic, as France was? We should have enjoyed all the advantages of a fixed par of exchange none the less by being ourselves a party to the league. And has the nation prospered so much since 1873 that we are justified in glorying in monometallism? Some individuals have prospered, no doubt. All those who have a realized capital in gold have benefited. But for the bulk of the nation, for the industries which are the life and soul of the country, the change has been almost an unmixed evil.

GEO. JAMIESON.

At the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask the permission of the Senate that the entire volume, of which Mr. Jamieson's essay is a part, may be printed as a document, so that we all may see it, because it is a work of great research. It contains articles by two very able English consular officers, Mr. George Jamieson, at Shanghai, and Mr. Thomas Holyoke Box, at Yokohama, besides other articles from men eminently qualified to speak, and who know whereof they speak.

Mr. Jamieson and the other English consul go at length into the reasons why this awakening has taken place. They say that from time immemorial the Asiatics were in the habit of buying European goods with their regular trade-marks, and paying a fixed price therefor. They were satisfied; they did not think of manufacturing themselves, and probably they would have gone on in the same way for hundreds of years to come but for the difference in exchange. After silver was demonetized the silver price of goods went up. The European and American manufacturers were compelled to mark up the price of their goods in China and Japan in order to make a profit. If it costs a hundred dollars here to manufacture certain goods, they had to charge $150 or $200 in China and Japan in silver in order to get their money back.

When the price of goods commenced to go up, it was regarded by the Chinese and the Japanese as a great hardship. They were unable to pay the advanced price, and they commenced in a crude way to manufacture the goods themselves. They soon found that they could do it very well. They sent agents to this country and to England to examine the machinery, and they commenced to import it. When they got the machinery they found that they could manufacture just as well as anybody else. I am told that in the last year there has been a great boom in England in manufacturing machinery for the Orient; that the English have received for such machinery about $50,000,000 in one year. I am advised that the only boom England has had for years is in the manufacture of machinery for China and Japan, and it has only just begun.

Now, these consuls say that this can be checked by equalizing exchange. If it is not equalized they all predict and figure it out and make a demonstration to show that the manufacturing of the world will be transferred from the Occident to the Orient, that Europe and America can not manufacture in competition with the millions of Asia, because they are already trained. You do not have to train them to manufacture. They see it done, and they can do it. They can do any kind of manufacturing.

The French consul at Yokohama bears testimony to the same fact that the English consul does. He says they can not stand the competition. Here is an extract from the report of the French consul at Yokohama, M. Klobukowski. He reports as follows to this Government:

There is no country in the extreme East which will not be invaded by goods made in Japan in imitation of European wares. Some of them are still inferior in quality; the greater number, thanks to modern machinery, are quite equal to ours. Both are of a cheapness which the high price of our labor will never permit us to attain. Then, again, our trade-marks are unprotected in Japan. The natives have only to imitate or copy your articles without necessarily acknowledging their obligation. Their amour propre does not brook the accusation of being mere imitators; they introduce, therefore, some trifling alteration in our machinery, and thereupon, with an easy conscience, take out themselves a fresh patent in their own country.

Finally, the depreciation in other countries of their silver money gives Japanese and Asiatics generally an enormous advantage. For them silver has lost none of its value. Their manufactures and exportation are thus favored in an extraordinary degree, while the rise in the value of gold, which is the money of Europe, becomes every day a more and more serious obstacle to the importation of our goods.

For these reasons, says the French consul in conclusion, foreign competition in Japan will have before it a very heavy task, we will not say to keep itself alive, but to escape annihilation.

If there is any series of facts upon any subject established beyond controversy it is that the Asiatics, with 50 cents advantage in the difference of exchange, can undersell both Europe and America on all manufactured articles. It has been a question whether it would extend to the coal trade and to the iron trade. For example, about twenty years ago the Japanese found immense coal fields in that country, and I remember very well the excitement created thereby. Coal mines were opened, but at the surface the coal was not so good as it was deeper down, and the Japanese got into competition with coal from England, which was taken there in ballast, and they could not make it pay.

The Government tried to work the coal mines and it lost money and quit. But when the silver price of coal went up 20 or 30 per cent the Japanese started on those coal mines again, and they are now practically supplying the great Pacific with coal. From Bombay to San Francisco you will find the Japanese, with their lines of steamships, furnishing the country with coal. The English authorities say that it is hopeless to attempt to mine coal in Australia or to send coal from England in competition with the Japanese, and that the Japanese have the coal trade of the Pacific. It is the conclusion to which they have all arrived. Australia is right there with all the advantage of distance, but she is on a gold basis, and her people, being of European descent, can not work on a level with the Asiatics under any circumstances, and particularly when the difference of exchange is 50 per cent against them.

The world was startled at the exhibition of power which Japan made in the late war. War now requires mechanical skill and genius, without which bravery, tactics, and everything else are a failure. But Japan showed mechanical skill and genius equal to the highest class of European or American skill. She has her iron works. She has an abundance of iron and coal. China, likewise, has an abundance of both iron and coal, with unlimited cotton fields. There is nothing that we can raise that they can not produce; and with an advantage of 50 per cent in exchange, we can not compete with them.

The farmers and planters first felt this competition. While the equilibrium of exchange was maintained the United States had almost a monopoly of the market of Europe for cotton and wheat. No effort was made, nor could any be made, to introduce Asiatic products. Our advantage in proximity and our superior skill in farming more than equalized the cheap labor of Asia, and there was no trouble as to wheat and cotton. But when gold prices went down they had that advantage. To illustrate it, I may state that for the last one hundred or one hundred and fifty years the average price of a bushel of wheat in Liverpool has been an ounce of silver. The parity between a bushel of wheat and an ounce of silver in value has been most remarkable. The fluctuations have been slight. Sometimes when there was a short crop of wheat there would be a little difference between the price of an ounce of silver and a bushel of wheat, but taking it right along for any ten years the average price of a bushel of wheat and the average price of an ounce of silver have been the same.

Let us see how it works. The Asiatic sends his bushel of wheat to Liverpool and sells it for an ounce of silver. He coins that silver at home into more than $1.30 of our money. In India it is $1.37. In Japan it is about $1.30, depending upon the ratio between gold and silver. Before the demonetization of silver the American farmer took his bushel of wheat to Liverpool and got his ounce of silver, and at home he could have it coined into $1.29. So the equilibrium of exchange kept things as they were, in farming as well as in manufacturing. But after gold prices had gone down silver prices remained stationary, and the Asiatic continued to take his bushel of wheat to Liverpool and sell it for an ounce of silver and get his $1.30 or $1.37, as the case might be.

But by and by the American took his bushel of wheat there and got his ounce of silver, and he could get for it only $1, then 75 cents, now only 50 cents. The American farmer with his 50 cents was unable, and is unable, to produce wheat in competition with the Asiatic farmer. We have told the manufacturers that all the time, and I sometimes fancied that it was not unpleasant to them, because it gave them cheap wheat. The same is also true of cotton. Before the demonetization of silver, and before there was this difference of exchange, India exported no cotton. She now exports between fifty and sixty million dollars' worth of raw cotton besides what she uses at home. Then, Egypt is producing a large amount of cotton. There it is produced under the British lash. They whip the laborers to make them work. It is necessary to whip them in order to get enough labor out of them to pay interest upon the English debt, or the Rothschild debt, which, by the way, will not bear examination as to its honesty.

Then comes China with unlimited cotton fields and with all these advantages. Something must be done, because, as all those officers say, and the proof is piled up beyond contradiction, if things remain as they are Western civilization must yield. The labor of this country is not only going to be put on a plane with Asiatic labor, but the Asiatic is going to have 50 cents advantage in the difference of exchange in selling his products here. Already the products of the Western world are being excluded from the East, and the products of the East are coming to the West.

Here is an article published in the London Times on the 28th of October. The London Times can tell the truth when it talks about India. Of course it can not tell the truth with respect to conditions here, because it can never see on this side of the Atlantic. It can not tell anything that it can not find out. But it tells the truth about India. I ask the Secretary to read the portion I have marked, in order to show the anxiety of the London Times with respect to India. Since India's hands have been tied by suspending coinage, she is gradually being blotted out. Her interests are in danger from her own race by English laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

When lately the chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Company looked forward to the time when its steamers might be built on the Yangtse Kiang and its head offices transferred to Tokyo, people smiled at the prediction as a piece of amusing hyperbole. But Sir Thomas Sutherland knew perfectly well what he was saying. The leading organs of British commerce in India have for weeks been speaking in the same tone, and with a gravity that excludes any sense of humor. We have from time to time narrated the steps by which Japan is trying to capture the markets of the far East. The new treaties which recognized her equality with the Western trading countries as a civilized mercantile power, her establishment of a consul-general at Bombay, the creation of steamer lines which shall defy Western competition by the aid of State subsidies, the dismissal of foreign employees in her factories, arsenals, and railway workshops, and the development of her mill and engineering productions on an enormous scale, form the industrial side of that long-prepared advance of which the military aspects recently startled Europe. As European statesmen are now compelled to recognize in Japan a predominant factor in Eastern politics, so British capitalists and Indian mill owners are being forced to acknowledge her successes in the great commercial struggle of the nations.

The apprehensions of the Indian manufacturers have a more serious basis than those of their British competitors. The Indian mills trust for their profits to exactly the same class of goods as the Japanese mills are mainly constructed to produce. The chief market for the Indian manufactures by steam power is the market which Japan is resolutely determined to dominate, and for the command of which she has geographical advantages that India does not possess. The Indian producers, moreover, have a cause of apprehension quite apart from the natural tendencies of trade. Japan regulates her currency solely with a view to her own needs; the Indian currency is regulated only in part with an eye to Indian economic requirements. The overruling compulsion in Indian finance is the obligation to pay in silver a sum of about twenty millions a year to England in gold. India, in fact, stands half way between the gold-using countries of the West and the silver-using countries of the East, and she runs a risk of being crushed between the two. She has to compete in production with the cheap silver currencies of the far East, and she has to compete with them under the necessity of manipulating her currency to suit the chief gold-using country of the West.

India enters on the struggle with her mints closed and with the mints of Japan open. The avowed object of the closing of the Indian mints is to create an artificial scarcity of coin in India and to give to the rupee an artificial value. We have from the first pointed out the economic dangers incident to this experiment. It may be extremely convenient to Indian financiers to discharge their gold debt to England with the help of an appreciated rupee, but it is extremely inconvenient to Indian producers to pay in a scarce rupee the cost of manufactures for which they have to take exchange payment in the nonappreciated silver currency of the farther East. In proportion as the artificial appreciation of the rupee affords permanent relief to Indian official finance in regard to gold obligations, it lays a permanent burden upon Indian production in the competition with silver-using countries.

It is this combination of artificial and natural difficulties which intensifies the anxieties of the Indian mill owners at present. The Calcutta and Bombay newspapers state the case with perfect clearness. "Manufacturing supremacy," says the Bombay Gazette, "is not an inalienable property; it can be transferred from one country to another. We recently made reference to the fact that one of the Chinese viceroys has erected not only a great cotton mill, covering 6 acres, but iron and steel works on an immense scale. What one viceroy has done on his own initiative the Japanese propose to do systematically throughout China." The territorial ambitions of Japan in regard to China have for the moment received a check. But the industrial exploitation of China forms a fixed principle in Japan's international programme. The Japanese are quite willing to allow other nations to share with them in the commercial benefits to be derived from the opening up of China to foreign trade, for they know when once this opening up has been effected their geographical position will give them predominant advantages in the competition with Western producers. They believe that they can command in China a cheaper and more disciplined labor than can be obtained either in Europe or in India. When the last mail left Bombay two Japanese missions of inquiry from the Cotton Spinners' Association and the Chamber of Commerce at Tokyo were at Shanghai, with instructions to travel inland and to report on localities for erecting cotton mills to be worked by Chinese labor, but under Japanese supervision and with Japanese capital.

Meanwhile Japan has determined to supply her own wants. It is stated that only one-fourth of her requirements are now imported, as against 67 per cent six years ago. Even more striking is her determination to get rid of European help in the actual work of production. "Since the date, now four years ago," says the Bombay Gazette, "when the foreign mill managers all received notice on one day that their services would no longer be required after the expiry of the notice, not a single man of Western birth has been engaged in the cotton mills, and the half million odd spindles at work are entirely under indigenous direction. There are 2,100 miles of railway open and 400 miles more under construction; but the only foreign assistance in their working is that of a solitary Scotchman, whose ties to the country have been strengthened by his marrying a Japanese girl." Even in the arsenals, with their rapid turn-out of arms of precision, only two or three Europeans now remain. The coasting trade has passed entirely into the hands of Japanese shippers and engineers. A similar process is going on throughout the whole merchant navy of Japan, and is only retarded by the expediency of having captains and chief engineers who hold English certificates, with a view to securing favorable insurance rates. But at any moment the Japanese Government may organize a system of marine insurance which will oust the British employees from this last foothold in Japanese enterprise. The results already attained justify Sir Alfred Lyall's forecast of the new era when the industrial inventions by which Europe has hitherto prevailed over Asia will be turned against their inventors.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call particular attention to one sentence from the article which has been read by the Secretary:

India enters on the struggle with her mints closed and with the mints of Japan open.

That tells the whole story. It tells the story that was told to English statesmen when they proposed to cut off the competition with English manufacturers by putting India on a gold basis. The textile fabric associations of England demonstrated to Parliament that they could not compete in manufacturing with India, their own province; that the difference of exchange was more prohibitory than the McKinley act, and they furnished the tables to show the fact. And they asked that the difference of exchange be equalized by the restoration of silver. The British Government would not do it. They said, "We will equalize it by putting India on a gold basis," and they carried out their purpose. They suspended coinage and put a duty of 5 per cent on silver.

When England did that it was said to them that China and Japan would come into the field and be just as formidable rivals as India; that they had unlimited resources of every sort, material, and labor to supply the world with all kinds of manufactures. The English laughed at the statement, and said China and Japan were too slow; that they would never wake up, because they had been asleep for hundreds of years. They sent a commission to Japan to induce that Government to join with them in adopting the gold standard. The commission started while our Congress was in extra session. While we were engaged in repealing the last law that provided for silver money that commission went to Japan. Japan sent a commission here. I myself spent weeks with the members of it. They went to England and to India, and they resolved to stand by the money of their fathers, and have good times. It was impossible for England to deceive the Japanese.

But what occurred? After the late Chinese-Japanese war was over, the powers united with Russia to deny to Japan the fruits of her victory. I inquired of a very intelligent Englishman why they did that. I asked him what was the relation between Japan and Russia. "Ah," he said, "Russia will not injure us, but Japan will." I asked him, "How will Japan injure you?" He replied that "Japan is our most dangerous rival in manufactures. Europe recognizes that fact, and that is what makes Europe a unit against Japan." If they could have found any excuse to crush Japan by arms, they would have enslaved the Japanese, and the only danger which threatens those people is the combination of Europe to subjugate them and destroy their industrial capacity.

The grave question is presented, Will the American people be as wise as the Japanese? Will they have a policy of their own? Will they have a financial and political and commercial policy of their own as Japan has, or will they allow the creditor combination in Great Britain to govern and impoverish them? What a spectacle we present compared with Japan. Twenty years ago we mocked her as a barbarous country. She was not allowed to have treaties with the civilized nations of the world on equal terms. To-day she is recognized by all, and feared by all Europe. To-day she is prosperous beyond anything in her history, and equal to anything in the history of modern nations.

Twenty years ago we were the richest and proudest nation on earth. Our credit was the best in the world. Nay, it was a shorter time ago. Only a few years ago United States bonds bearing 4 per cent, running eighteen years, sold for 27 premium. Last February the same character of bonds, running thirty years, sold for 4½ premium, and this, too, after the gold combination had been at work for twenty years to improve the currency of the country. Before they improved the credit by putting us on a gold basis there was no limit to the credit of the country, and no limit to the respect of mankind for us. Twenty years ago, before we submitted to the rule of the British syndicate of gold gamblers, we were an independent and self-respecting people. Twenty years ago we were not spending hundreds of millions per annum to buy aristocratic husbands for our daughters. Twenty years ago we were not aping foreign manners as we are now doing. Twenty years ago we could pay as we went without taxing the people beyond endurance. Twenty years ago the people were at work. Now millions in this favored land are in enforced idleness, starving for bread. With all this, produced by destroying the money of the Constitution, by cutting in two our metallic money, we hear from the other end of the avenue—what? We hear a command from the Executive to destroy the greenback and cause $500,000,000 more of contraction. That is the remedy which is proposed to us!

Why can not the United States take a step forward? Why can we not have some of the patriotism that made this country independent? We are told that we can not do it because we do not want to be in company with half-civilized nations. We are told that the most civilized nations in the world have gold alone for their money and if we are to be more civilized we must do as they do. Do not the civilized nations of the world do some things that we do not want to do? Must we have war and revolution because other civilized nations have them? Civilized nations have monarchies, despotisms, classes. Do we want them? There is just as much reason for inaugurating a monarchy here as there is in indorsing the financial policy of the gold syndicate of London. Ah, aristocracy and the gold standard are one. They have sprung from the same source. The leading financial journals of Great Britain say that property must rule, and the only way to give property supremacy is by contraction to the gold standard. They say that it is dangerous to let the people prosper, for that produces democracy. Every crowned head in Europe is a servant of this gold combination. The crowned heads of Europe rest for security upon the gold combination of London. They make peace or war as dictated by the Rothschilds combination. Monarchy and the gold standard have joined hands to enslave mankind.

I am for a new Declaration of Independence. I am for an American policy. I am for the money of the Constitution. I am for the use of both silver and gold to stop falling prices. I am for more money to make enterprise possible. I am for more money to set the masses to work. The labor of the country reproduces the wealth of the country every few years. The enforced idleness of the last three years has destroyed four times as much property as the war between the sections. There is nothing so destructive to civilization, to prosperity, to law and order, to good government as enforced idleness. But the powers that govern want enforced idleness and poverty, so that they can govern. You see that condition everywhere in our country. Go where you will, you hear people say, "If I had money I would go into conventions; I would pay attention to political matters; but these times are so hard that I can not get time to read a newspaper. All I can do is to get bread for my family." And that is the situation in which it is proposed to keep them. It is a mockery to call this a free Government when the money powers control everything. What office in the gift of the present Administration has not been at the disposal of Wall street? What favors are there for the man who rebels against Wall street, I do not care what party he is in? What can he get from this Administration, or what can his constituents get, and what favors could he get from the last Administration?

The gold-standard combination appoints all your officers. They go further; they are in your conventions and they furnish the money for the two parties. It is time, I say, that the American people took this matter in their own hands. I tell you, my fellow-Senators, if the powers that are congregated here should continue to be the servants of the money powers of Europe, the time is not far distant when the American people will take this matter in hand, and there will be a political revolution at the ballot box before the chains of slavery are permanently fastened upon the limbs of enterprise in this country.

Another year or two will make times much worse. Another year or two will bring Asiatic goods into every town and village in this country. Another year or two will put millions out of employment. Who can contemplate such a result? Everyone who knows anything knows that the misery in this country must be attributed to bad legislation and maladministration. Everyone who knows anything knows that twenty years of profound peace and abundant harvests in a country of unlimited resources can not be the cause of hard times; and no man can suggest any other disturbing cause but the money question. In no other department has there been a revolution. In that department there has been a revolution that has destroyed half the world's money. In that department there has been a revolution that has converted silver obligations into gold obligations. In that department the laws of Congress have been treated as chaff. In that department gold gamblers and money changers have been supreme, and the result is before you. Will you continue it? If you will, you will hear a voice from the great people when they understand, as they are getting to understand, what is being done, and who did it, that will make the bravest man tremble.

I hope that this question will be examined by every Senator, that he may know we have an industrial rival at our doors with whom we can not compete, and that there must be some remedial legislation or the times in this country will be so sad as to make the heart of man bleed. Such a time is coming, and I think it is the duty of every Senator to examine the situation and learn for himself what the trouble is. Cease to take the mandates of foreign syndicates. Cease to treat Wall street as the only part of this country. Cease to deny that the operations of Wall street disturb the business of the country. The business of the country is disturbed as bad as it can be. You can not make it worse. Nothing can be worse than taking the people's money away from them. There can be no prosperity without money. You have taken away from the people their money. You say they shall have nothing but gold as a circulating medium. Gold never did circulate among the masses of the people and never can, and to-day you are discussing the propriety of depriving them of all money, for when all money but gold is destroyed the people will have no money.

It may be suggested that we allow private corporations to issue money and speculate among the people and expand and contract the currency at their pleasure. That would be worse than no money. When you take from the Government its sovereign authority to create money and give it to private speculators, you abdicate everything that is good in government; you destroy all that government was made for. Here you punish individuals criminally for making money or counterfeiting money because it is such a sacred right; but you propose to destroy all money except gold and set the speculators to robbing the people.

I am opposed to bank rule. I want them to get out of the governing business. They have governed badly; they have brought misery upon the people. We have had bank government for twenty years, and it has produced more misery than was ever in this country before. We want them to attend to the banking business and to get out of the governing business. The idea that it is the business of banks to create money is what I oppose. The only connection the Government now has with the banking business is the creation of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; a department to help them run the banks. We do not need it. We do not want to pay interest on money for the benefit of the bankers. I am in favor of getting out of the banking business altogether and going into the governing business. No country can prosper without going into the governing business, and such governing business is the creation of money.

Look what Governments have done when they have been in the governing business. Take the Roman Republic for two hundred years and you find that it made conquests and brought in the gold of other countries. Rome had metal pieces stamped and she regulated the quantity, and during that time she got power enough to conquer the world. Venice made her credit full legal tender and exempted it from execution, and during the Dark Ages she maintained a position as the great commercial nation of the world. For six hundred years her paper was good in every part of the world because it paid debts and taxes at home. She exercised her governing functions. England went into the governing business during the Napoleonic wars and suspended specie payments and created money that not only conquered Napoleon, but extended the commerce of England more than it had been extended for one hundred years preceding.

We went into the governing business in part during the war. We should go into the governing business absolutely. Thaddeus Stevens brought in a bill to create money, greenbacks, but Wall street came here and mutilated it so as to deprive it of its functions of paying duties on imports. But still, with that paper crippled to that extent, the Government was in the governing business, and it was the greenback, crippled as it was, that furnished the means of carrying on the war. The greenback cost no interest; it saved us from destruction. But bankers, in order to get the Government out of the banking business, had the national banks created and then retired the greenbacks largely and issued bonds to retire them and paid interest on the bonds to enable the banks to issue circulation which was no better than the greenbacks. It was no better because it was redeemable in greenbacks. It was not as good; but it made money for the bankers and gave them power to expand and contract the currency; and that was the beginning of the bank rule which has brought misery to every household in the land. That was the first step.

The next step was to get rid of silver, to make money scarce, to give the bankers a monopoly of the circulation, and to give the bondholders and money changers 2 for 1. These steps have gone on until they are considered the established policy of the Government.

See where we are now. We are unable to pay current expenses. We are increasing our foreign debts from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000 annually, and we are borrowing money to pay interest on borrowed money. We have to sell our products in the gold markets of Europe. We can not get enough for them to pay for our imports this year. Last year we did have a surplus to apply on our debts. This year our imports are added to the debt, and the President of the United States says that he is borrowing money to maintain the gold standard. For whom? For the people? No; for the creditors; and he is borrowing money to pay them. There is no other way to pay them according to the fixed policy of carrying on the Government. Are we to be told that 70,000,000 people can not conduct a profitable business in time of peace? That is the situation produced by the gold policy.

Then they propose to increase taxation, to destroy more money; to make money scarcer and times harder. Some propose tariff and other forms of taxation. You have the people taxed to death now. People can not stand taxation when they are out of business. The tax they are paying now is four times as hard to pay as it would be to pay double the tax if they were doing business. That is what ails the country; the people can not stand the present taxation.

But the President tells us in his bland language that although prices are falling it is a blessing, because we have to buy as well as to sell. The fixed charges upon the people of this country for taxes, for interest, for educating the children, and for other matters that have to be provided for in money, take all the proceeds of labor, and leave little or nothing with which to buy. The fact that prices are so low means bankruptcy. There is no compensation in low prices to the producer when he has nothing with which to buy.

Take the manufacturers of the East. Protection will do them no good while the West and the producing sections are impoverished by low prices, made low by the contraction of the currency and by competition with the Asiatics. You can not get relief in that direction. Pile up your tariff and it will do no good. A tariff on manufactured articles will not protect us against Asia. You may have a tariff on raw material and everything else, and you may pile it up, and you can not keep out Asiatic products with the present rate of exchange. As long as the difference in exchange gives them 50 cents advantage you have got to build a Chinese wall around the country to keep them out.

But a tariff on manufactured articles is unfair under those circumstances, because the farmers have been impoverished by this competition, and you can not raise the price of manufactured articles artificially, because the farmer can not pay it unless you will allow him to prosper. Give him more money, give him prosperity, and he will buy your goods. Senators talk about overproduction as the cause. It is underconsumption. Nobody's wants are supplied. Everyone who will reflect for a moment will know that the wants of man grow faster than he can supply them. If he has money with which to buy he will buy everything that conduces to his happiness. That gives employment and makes employment. There will always be overproduction, because there can be no consumption to equal the production with only one kind of money. It is underconsumption that is the trouble in this country.

I hope that this question will be examined, and that the American people will realize wherein they have been robbed by the rule of the banks, and see if they will not contend for the rule of the people under the Constitution as it was ordained by the fathers.

I ask to have the papers to which I referred, on "The silver question: Injury to British trade and manufactures," printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to address the Senate at this time; but in the line of the remarks made by the Senator from Nevada I send to the desk a paper that I should like to have printed as a public document. It is an article by Mr. H. Kopsch, a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society of Great Britain, who is, I understand, connected with the diplomatic service at Shanghai. It is a very conservative and well-written article on the precise subject upon which the Senator from Nevada has been addressing the Senate. I ask to have it printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the resolution may lie over. Other Senators may wish to submit some remarks upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department; and it was signed by the Vice-President.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH). The first order of business on the Calendar under Rule IX will be announced.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during sessions of Congress.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that that bill be made the unfinished business to be taken up at 2 o'clock every day until disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill stands as the unfinished business.

Mr. PEFFER. Then I ask that it be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be temporarily passed over.

NATIONAL AND STATE SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, December 16, 1895.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 500 copies of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home and 500 copies of the report of the Assistant Inspector-General of State Homes for the use of the officers of said National and State Homes; 150 copies of each of said reports to be bound in the usual form.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 17, 1895, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 16, 1895.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

REPORTS, ETC., REFERRED TO COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following documents; which were severally referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of project and estimate of cost for the improvement of Pine River, at St. Clair City, Mich.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, final report of Col. George H. Elliot on improvement of Dalecarlia reservoir.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of plan and estimate for improving Belle River, Michigan.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of plan and estimate for the improvement of Sebewaing River, Michigan.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

REMOVAL OF TURTLE MOUNTAIN INDIANS, NORTH DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relating to the removal of the Turtle Mountain Indians, in North Dakota, and a copy of a bill ratifying an agreement with the Indians, and making appropriation for carrying the same into effect; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Commissioner of Railroads to the Secretary of the Interior for the year 1895; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PROPAGATION OF FOOD FISHES DURING THE FISCAL YEAR ENDED JUNE 30, 1895.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Chief Clerk and Acting Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries transmitting a statement showing expenditures under all appropriations for propagation of food fishes during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, and also under certain other appropriations; which was referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Mrs. Rowena Clark and Annie Lawrence against the United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of cases wherein claimants for recompense for stores and supplies alleged to have been furnished the Government have failed to prove loyalty; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

RULES.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] a moment, to see if we can agree upon an order for to-morrow touching consideration of Rules X and XI. It is desirable, as I believe, that the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which are the rules of this Congress, in view of the increase in the membership of the House, should provide substantially for the membership of the committees as they were in the last Congress; and that would require an amendment. I would say, also, that it is in the minds of the majority, or at least some of them, to present for the consideration of the House the creation of additional Elections Committees, with jurisdiction similar to the election committee in former Congresses; and I have drawn this resolution.

Resolved, That on Tuesday, December 17, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it shall be in order to consider amendments to Rules X and XI of the House.

These are the rules that create the committees and fix their jurisdiction; and I would be glad, if it meets the approval of this side and the other side, by unanimous consent, that order might be adopted.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, of course I can only speak for myself. As I understand the purpose of the majority, it is to increase the standing committees from the number provided for by the rules of the Fifty-first Congress substantially to the number provided for in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, which were made after the last apportionment and after the increase in the membership of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. CRISP. To that proposition I am very sure, so far as I have heard an expression, there would be absolutely no objection upon this side, and the gentleman, I think, can now take that order without any postponement of the question at all—that he will simply take such an order as he desires to increase the committees as suggested. To the other proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, looking to the multiplication of the Committee on Elections, I am equally sure that on this side there will be some objection. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no objection at all to agreeing to take up the question whenever it suits the majority to present it. I understand very well, and only mention it because those gentlemen who are not familiar with the old rules must understand, that this request is made because there is no Committee on Rules. If there were a Committee on Rules, that committee could make a report, which would be privileged, and the matter could come up; but there being no Committee on Rules, it requires unanimous consent to bring this matter up for discussion. I say that so far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever, and I do not think this side has, to the order increasing the number and membership of the standing committees. As to the other proposition, to take it up to-morrow and debate it, I have no objection to that. Of course, I can but speak for myself. I have no objection to taking it up to debate it, but I have objection to the proposition after it comes up.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The resolution makes it in order to offer amendments to these two rules to-morrow. Then, of course, the whole subject is in the possession of the House on the several propositions that probably would be offered by way of amendments, increasing the number of Elections committees. I have made this announcement, so that both sides of the House might be informed as to the amendments that probably would be offered. Of course it would be considered under the ordinary rules of the House, if this resolution is agreed to, and would be for the House to take such order as it saw proper. I will ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, December 17, immediately after the reading of the Journal, it shall be in order to consider amendments to Rules X and XI of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to agreeing to the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; accordingly the resolution is agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS OF BOARD OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 500 copies of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Home and 500 copies of the report of the Assistant Inspector-General of State Homes for the use of the officers of said National and State Homes, 150 copies of each of said reports to be bound in the usual form.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. STEELE. I desire to state, Mr. Speaker, that the standing rule for printing does not provide any copies for the use of the officers of the Homes, who, of course, require these proceedings for practical purposes, and therefore this resolution is offered. The binding of the 150 copies specified in the resolution will cost, I am informed, about 25 cents a volume. I have conferred with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, and he tells me that this is the usual course to pursue in such cases.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not inclined to object, Mr. Speaker, but I simply want to say again that it is perfectly evident that from the beginning to the end of this Congress we are to have special provisions of this kind all along the line, growing largely out of the legislation of the last Congress in relation to printing. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. This is certainly a very inexpensive matter, and it is absolutely necessary that the officers of the Homes should have copies of their own proceedings for their guidance. As I have already said, no provision is made for the printing of copies for their use, and therefore this resolution is necessary.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman from Indiana any information as to what it will cost to print these copies?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir; but the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], who is more familiar with these matters than I am, can probably give the gentleman the information.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. STEELE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES FOR DECEMBER.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution for which I shall ask immediate consideration. After the resolution is read I will also ask permission to make a brief statement in connection with the request.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution simply conforms to the precedents in such cases. Such a resolution has been regularly passed at this season of the year, and unless there is objection to the resolution I will ask now for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I believe the resolution is the ordinary one, and very proper generally, but I do not recollect just what the precedents have been in this respect at the organization of a new House. For instance, take an outgoing employee who went out of office, say, on the 1st, 2d, or 3d day of this session; does this resolution pay him a month's salary?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Or an incoming employee who comes in at some time during this month, say to-day; does this resolution pay him a month's salary?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It does not pay him a month's salary. It simply pays him for the portion of the month for which he is entitled to compensation, beginning on the day of his appointment. It provides for paying the employees that are on the roster on the 20th of December what is due them for the month, the same as they would be paid ordinarily on the 31st of the month.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, it simply substitutes the 20th day of this month for the regular pay day.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is all.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is, it pays these employees ten days in advance.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It pays in advance for ten days. The same thing has been done by every Congress. I have here references to the similar resolutions that have been adopted by every Congress.

A MEMBER. Would it not be better to make it the 19th instead of the 20th?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In response to the inquiry of my friend on the other side, I will say that the date as originally named has been changed from the 19th to the 20th upon the suggestion of Mr. Snyder, the disbursing clerk of the last House. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was read twice, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LAND ALLOTMENTS IN OKLAHOMA, ETC.

Mr. FLYNN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution of inquiry which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by act of Congress approved March 2, 1895, an agreement between the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians in Oklahoma and United States commissioners was duly ratified and provision made for the allotment of lands therein to the Wichita Indians, and providing for the opening of the surplus lands after allotment to homestead settlement; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior has wholly failed to appoint agents to allot said lands as provided in said act: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to report to this House, first, the reasons and causes operating, if any, to delay the appointment of allotting agents and the allotting of said lands to said Indians; second, whether any of his connections or relations by blood or marriage are acting as attorneys for said Indians, or any party or parties interested in delaying the opening of the same to settlement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MCMILLIN. This resolution does not conform to the ordinary language of resolutions of inquiry calling on Departments for such information——

Mr. FLYNN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask the Clerk to pass me the resolution for a moment. I think I am correct in the statement I made.

Mr. FLYNN. The resolution does not allude to anybody that the gentleman from Tennessee has had imported into Oklahoma.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not import.

Mr. FLYNN. No; but Hoke Smith does for you.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As to that, I do not seek any controversy. I am not here in any spirit of levity or captiousness. But resolutions of this kind calling on heads of Departments or other executive officers for information usually leave a discretion with those officers. This resolution does not. I think, therefore, it ought to be referred to the appropriate committee when appointed.

Mr. FLYNN. I hope the gentleman will not object to the House knowing whether or not Hoke Smith's relatives are being employed—whether Indian treaties and the opening up of lands are being held up by men claiming to be his friends.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman will put his resolution in the ordinary form——

Mr. FLYNN. It is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We will pass it without a stump speech.

Mr. FLYNN. I submit that it is in the ordinary form. This is not the first resolution I have introduced into this House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the gentleman has no desire to put his resolution in the usual form, I will ask that it go to the appropriate committee.

Mr. FLYNN. I will ask that the resolution be amended in compliance with the gentleman's request by inserting "if not incompatible with the public service."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I thought the gentleman had it in the usual form.

Mr. FLYNN. I am accepting the proposed amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not offer it. I am glad the gentleman has got information as to the proper form.

Mr. FLYNN. I will offer the resolution, then, in a form to suit the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution as amended?

Mr. MADDOX. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] objects.

Mr. FLYNN. I understand the objection was to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objected to the consideration of the resolution as amended.

Mr. MADDOX. I withdraw my objection. I did not understand the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The objection of the gentleman from Georgia being withdrawn, is there further objection to the consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLYNN. I merely desire to say that I appreciate the kindness of the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Tennessee. The last Congress provided for the allotment of certain lands in Oklahoma, and it appropriated money for that purpose. A provision was inserted in that bill compelling the Secretary to open those lands to settlement within a year after the allotments were made. It was thought that that would be sufficient to cause those lands to be thrown open. Prior to that he waited two years after allotting lands in the Kickapoo matter before it suited his sweet will to declare them open for settlement. The proviso in that last bill compelled him to open the lands within a year after the allotments were made. Now, to take advantage of the House and defeat the intention of the act he has refused to appoint the allotting agents. This resolution asks him why he has done so and whether or not it is a fact that his relatives are being employed in this case as attorneys for the Indians. I think this will be answered conclusively by the Secretary. It is a well-known fact—nobody will deny it, so report says—that Hoke Smith has got a lot of relatives hanging around here who hold up men who want treaties or contracts ratified. One contract was handed me this morning under which a man claiming to be a relative of Hoke Smith was to get $2,700 provided he got the Secretary to ratify a certain agreement. It is time that we ought to know about these things.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, but will yield to the gentleman from Florida if he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to ask the gentleman a question and do not desire that he should yield to me any of his time. I propose to make a few remarks of my own, called forth by the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma, to which we have just listened.

Mr. FLYNN. I am glad I have succeeded in stirring up the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Florida. The gentleman from Oklahoma will please take his seat. I have the floor. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. All gentlemen will take their seats, and order must be preserved on the floor. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oklahoma has used language in the House to-day which induces me to take the floor for the purpose of submitting a few remarks in reply.

I had the honor, sir, of sitting over in the "Cherokee Strip" for a whole Congress in the very near vicinity of the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I have been very much surprised this morning to hear a gentleman who is usually courteous and should be possessed with a proper idea of the ordinary usages of deportment as practiced in this House, the requirements of a proper and respectful demeanor in addressing the House on public subjects, and the proper observance of due courtesy to any Department of the Government; I say that I am surprised that he should have indulged in language this morning which I think, when he comes to reflect upon it after the House shall have adjourned to-day, he will himself very greatly regret.

Mr. Speaker, no member of this House, even though he happens to be a Republican—a member of that large majority now in power upon this floor upon a temporary wave of public sentiment—[laughter on the Republican side] the force of which wave gentlemen are liable very greatly to overestimate, and the duration of which they might have learned by former experience, and very bitter former experience, too, is not to be absolutely counted upon—I say that no member of this House should refer to a member of the Cabinet of the President, the Secretary of one of the great Departments of the Government, in such terms as the gentleman from Oklahoma has seen proper to employ this morning. If he has any criticism to make, if there are any facts relating to the conduct of public officials which he deems it desirable the House should be in possession of, there is a proper and a customary manner in which to apply for such information, and not in language which will shock the sense of all gentlemen who have due regard for what should be the conduct of business in the House.

I did not object to the consideration of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma (although it struck me it might be objectionable, although I did not hear it very well) for the reason that it sought information pertaining to local affairs of the Territory represented by the gentleman himself. But when he uses language of personal disrespect of a high official of the Government and of a man who deservedly stands as high before the people of this country as any man who sits on this floor, I submit that he abuses the unanimous consent for which he is indebted to the courtesy of this side of the House.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I regret that any remarks of mine should have hurt the tender feelings of the gentleman from the magnolia State, but let me say, sir, that I came 1,700 miles last summer for the purpose of trying to see the President of the United States and ask him in regard to this very question—the dereliction of the Secretary of the Interior in executing the law of Congress.

When I called there I was notified by his private secretary, Mr. Thurber, to wait and write him a note, and he said he would see the President and see whether or not it would be agreeable for him to see me. I wrote the note in compliance with Mr. Thurber's request and waited a week, but never heard from him. Then I wrote a personal note to the President, asking for five minutes in which to lay certain matters concerning Oklahoma before him, saying that I did not expect if that letter went into the hands of his private secretary that I would ever get to see him, because I knew that he did not want me to; and then, never hearing a reply from that, I wrote to the Secretary of the Interior and asked him if he would not kindly advise me why the allotting agents, in conformity to this law, had not been appointed. Not receiving a reply to the first communication, I directed a second one to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He stated in his letter to me that the matter had been called to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior, and that he had not been requested to act in the matter. I sent to the Secretary of the Interior that answer of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with another request, asking for some information in relation to the matter, but never have received any reply.

If the facts which I have stated concerning the Secretary of the Interior are objectionable to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER] he should go and coach the gentleman who is placed there to preside over the destinies of a branch of the nation the magnitude of which was unknown to the gentleman from Georgia, except in the school district in which he resided, until he was discovered by Grover Cleveland. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Territory of Oklahoma, where 300,000 American citizens reside, has received nothing but calumny, vituperation, and abuse at the hands of this gentleman whom the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER] undertakes to defend. If there has ever been a good deed for which Hoke Smith has received credit, if the gentleman will examine into the record, he will find that it was performed by some of his subordinates in the Department, who had more good American horse sense than he had. I have some feeling in this matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You appear to have.

Mr. FLYNN. The people of Oklahoma have a right to have some feeling. They have been mistreated, not at the hands of this Congress, and, I will say freely to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. COOPER], not at the hands of the last Congress, although it was Democratic. The people of Oklahoma were honorably treated by the last Congress, and they are going to be treated in the same way by this Congress, and I trust that the country will know whether or not a man is allowed to preside over the destinies of our Territory (Hoke Smith virtually does), in the person of the Secretary of the Interior, who will allow private communications to remain on his desk unanswered when a poor homesteader in a dugout and his children are going around barefoot for nine months because the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Hoke Smith, has not sufficient time to give the matter consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.] I have no sympathy with Hoke Smith. There never has been a Secretary of the Interior since the foundation of the Government who has devoted less time to his public duties than this gentleman does, who is parading around the country saying he has changed his mind on the money question. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPRINT OF DOCUMENT RELATING TO VENEZUELA BOUNDARY.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a reprint shall be made of Senate Document No. 226, first session Fiftieth Congress, relating to the Venezuela boundary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that, pending the right to object, the gentleman will make a statement in regard to it. This document is probably out of print, and we know nothing about it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will state for the information of the House what the document is.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this document is out of print. A very great demand for it has arisen. It is a document covering perhaps 200 or 225 pages. It is stereotyped, and can be readily furnished to the House. As we are expecting, since the return of the President from North Carolina, to hear something from Venezuela, we should like, of course, to have this preliminary information accessible to the present Congress. It is not now attainable, excepting in the hall library, and even there the volume in which this document is bound has been withdrawn from the files by somebody who is studying the question.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman tell us the exact number of copies that would be printed under this resolution?

Mr. LACEY. That will be fixed by the printing statute. I do not remember the number.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to say to the gentleman that I heartily approve of the resolution. This is a very important document, and should be in the hands of every member of the House; but I doubt very much whether, under that resolution, a sufficient number will be printed to supply members with such copies as they need.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask if the gentleman has any suggestion to make as to the number that should be printed?

Mr. SAYERS. I would suggest that 500 copies be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. LACEY. I think there would be 2,000 copies under the statute, and that that will be a sufficient number.

Mr. SAYERS. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. How many copies do you propose to print?

Mr. LACEY. The number fixed by the statute. I think it is 2,000, but I am not sure.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Is it 2,000 or 1,000?

Mr. LACEY. My idea was that whatever number the statute fixes is supposed to be ample.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Does the gentleman think that there ought to be more printed than the number necessary for distribution among Members and Senators?

Mr. LACEY. If there is to be any change, I think it should be an increase rather than a diminution, for the reason that the country is very desirous to get this information. A great many requests have been made to Members of the House and Senators for this document, and they can not be supplied.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be better to put in the resolution 5,000 copies. You will not have more than enough then. If it was a dissertation on the stomach of grasshoppers we would probably get 10,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I am informed by gentlemen familiar with the statute that this resolution would only give 2,000 copies. If that should prove to be insufficient, another reprint could be made. We are liable to have some other matter relative to the Venezuelan question to print later in the session.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Has the gentleman examined the document in question?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will you state what its contents are?

Mr. LACEY. It contains all the correspondence up to 1887 upon the Venezuelan question, giving the statement of the English Government on their side and of the Venezuelan Government upon the other, and the correspondence of Mr. Baker and other officials representing the United States in Venezuela. It is a document that will be of very great utility in the consideration of that question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How far does the correspondence go back?

Mr. LACEY. It goes back to the beginning of the question. There are about 40 or 50 communications embraced in the document, which comprises about 250 pages.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does it go back to the transfer?

Mr. LACEY. It purports to give the history of the entire transaction, including the original claim of Venezuela, of Spain, of Holland, and of England—the official claims. There is a map also embraced in the document.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Does it define the line in dispute?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I only rise to say to the gentleman from Iowa that it strikes me that the resolution ought to make some disposition of this document when printed. If the document is simply printed, it is sent to the various document rooms and into the various files of the House, and only a few copies will be left for the use of the members of the House and also for the use of members of the Senate under this resolution of the gentleman. It seems to me he ought to have his resolution provide for the distribution of this document if he wants it for the use of the members of the House, to be distributed to members of the House, and then it would not go to the various document and files rooms. If an amendment is made to print a certain number of copies for the use of the Senate and House, then there will be a proper distribution by the officers, and members will get several copies.

Mr. LACEY. The purpose was to have this document go to the files, so that such members as desire to consult them could go there and examine them.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the reprint is made under the gentleman's resolution the distribution will take place under the rules, and copies will go to the various document and files rooms, and members would not get copies of it for their use and distribution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I have said, that if the document is printed under this resolution there will be very few copies for members—only about one copy to each member—while if the whole number is printed for the use of the House it will be divided by the number of members, and we will all get two or three copies.

Mr. LACEY. I would ask the gentleman if he has any suggestion to make as to the number. The gentleman is familiar with the demands.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The resolution as it stands will call for the printing of 1,682 copies, and those copies will be sent to the various document rooms and the file rooms, so that there will be only about one copy left for each member. Therefore, if the gentleman desires these copies for the use of members he would do well to change the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Then I will modify the resolution by adding the words "for the use of members of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that a provision reading "to be distributed among the members of the House, for the use of the House," might possibly send the documents in the same direction in which they ordinarily go, into the document rooms.

Mr. LACEY. I accept the amendment suggested and will ask the Clerk to report it again.

The amendment was read, as follows:

To be distributed among the members of the House, for the use of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES, BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if it be in order, I desire to call up a joint resolution which I believe lies on the Speaker's table, in regard to the miscellaneous expenses of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that will require unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 27) ratifying the use of the appropriation for materials and miscellaneous expenses for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the fiscal year 1896 for the purchase of articles provided for in the appropriation for the miscellaneous expenses of the Treasury Department, and authorizing the continued use of the same for the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the use by the Secretary of the Treasury of the appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in the act of March 2, 1895, chapter 189, acts Fifty-third Congress, third session, "for engravers', printers', and other materials, except distinctive paper, and for miscellaneous expenses, $190,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury," for the purchase of articles and the performance of services, for the payment of which an appropriation was made in the act of March 2, 1895, chapter 177, Laws of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, under the following caption "For contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, including all buildings under control of the Treasury, in Washington, D. C.," be, and the same is hereby, ratified and confirmed, and the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow to the disbursing agent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing all items disallowed because of the use of said appropriation in the manner above specified, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to continue the use of said appropriation for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in the manner in which said appropriation has heretofore been used, as above specified, for similar expenditures for said Bureau during the remaining portion of the fiscal year 1896, and no part of said appropriation shall be subject to the provisions of sections 240 and 3683 of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair will submit a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury relating to this resolution.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 12, 1895.

SIR: The Comptroller of the Treasury has recently rendered a decision to the effect that certain expenditures of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for items that are enumerated in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, "including all buildings under control of the Treasury in Washington, D. C.," as set forth on page 781, volume 28, Statutes at Large, are contingent expenses of the Treasury Department, and that therefore the appropriation for "material and miscellaneous expenses of engraving and printing," provided for under the head of "Engraving and printing," at page 920, volume 28, Statutes at Large, is not available for their payment; but that all such expenditures must be made from the appropriation for contingent expenses above referred to.

Unless relief be given by Congress, this decision will necessitate a suspension of the work of engraving and printing long before the expiration of the fiscal year, as the appropriation for contingent expenses is not sufficient to pay the additional burden thus placed upon it. The expenditures of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for items similar to those covered by the appropriation for contingent expenses, and by the decision of the Comptroller, amounted during the last fiscal year to $51,765.27, while the appropriation for these items of contingent expenses for the current fiscal year is only $58,470. It will thus be seen that if these items are paid from the appropriations for contingent expenses, they will absorb nearly all of the appropriation.

The items of expenditures covered by the decision in the work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing were included in the estimates submitted by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the expenses of engraving and printing the securities and obligations of the United States. If, therefore, the expenditures are made in accordance with the decision of the Comptroller there will be a surplus in the appropriation for that Bureau and a deficit in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department.

To avoid this, and to prevent a suspension of the work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, I have the honor to submit herewith a draft of a joint resolution, authorizing the use by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the money appropriated "for materials and miscellaneous expenses of engraving and printing," and beg to urge its immediate passage.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

HON. THOMAS B. REED,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I will state for the information of the House that the resolution does not involve any appropriation. The last Congress, like other Congresses preceding, made appropriation for the miscellaneous expenses of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and also for the contingent expenses of the Treasury Department. Up to the present time these items of appropriation have been expended as they appear upon the appropriation bills, but the present Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that under the law a portion of the expenses coming under the head of miscellaneous expenses of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing must be paid out of the contingent fund of the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand from the communication of the Secretary of the Treasury exactly on what ground that decision of the Comptroller has been made. The last appropriation bill is very distinct in providing that the appropriation shall be for these very purposes, and I can not quite understand how such a construction of the law has been made by the Comptroller.

Mr. SAYERS. The Secretary of the Treasury does not state the ground on which the Comptroller made his decision; but the purpose of this resolution is to suspend the law upon which the decision is made for the present fiscal year.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then this resolution is in entire accord with the intention of the last appropriation bill?

Mr. SAYERS. It is.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me see whether I understand the gentleman from Texas accurately. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is a bureau under the Treasury Department?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There is an appropriation for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department for this fiscal year, as there has been for many years past. And there is always an appropriation for supplies and miscellaneous expenses to be disbursed under the direction of the head of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And under the uniform construction given to the law in years past by various Comptrollers the expenditures have always been made for the miscellaneous expenses of that Bureau?

Mr. SAYERS. I believe so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But this Comptroller comes in and says that, notwithstanding such uniform construction, this appropriation for miscellaneous expenses shall not be used, but the expenditures for such purpose shall be thrown upon the regular appropriation for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department proper?

Mr. SAYERS. That is my understanding of the situation.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And as there is not money enough for the purpose in the contingent appropriation for the Department, the object of this resolution is to cure that technical ruling of the present Comptroller?

Mr. SAYERS. That is the purpose of the resolution as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then it seems to me that it is proper enough to pass this resolution if we must do so; but in giving my assent, as one member of the House, to its enactment, I want to say that this is not by any means the first time that technical rulings of the Comptroller have had to be overcome by legislation, the result being consumption of time without any profit or saving to the Treasury. It reminds me of an experience which happened in my boyhood. My father was coming up the Mississippi River on a little stern-wheel steamboat, when out there came from the bank two boys in a skiff, pulling for dear life and hallooing with all their might. Finally the steamboat was stopped. "What's the matter?" cried the mate. The little fellows turned around and started back to the bank exclaiming, "Stopped a steamboat, by jingo!" [Laughter.] So this Comptroller seems to have stopped a steamboat in this case, and no doubt he will keep on at it. I believe he stopped a very big one for you down in Louisiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. May I ask the gentleman from Texas a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Has the gentleman any assurance that the Comptroller will not set aside this resolution if passed?

Mr. SAYERS. None at all. It would not be proper for me to go to the Comptroller of the Treasury as to his future rulings.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COURT-ROOM ACCOMMODATIONS FOR SUPERIOR COURT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCRANTON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration Senate joint resolution No. 13. In this connection, I wish to have read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and when the resolution is taken up I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The joint resolution (S. R. 13) granting the State of Pennsylvania permission to use the United States court-houses at Scranton, Pa., and at Williamsport, Pa., was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That full permission be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of Pennsylvania and to the superior court of said State to occupy the United States court room and the rooms connected therewith at Scranton, in the county of Lackawanna, during the month of January, and at Williamsport, in the county of Lycoming, during the month of February, in each year, for the period of five years from the 1st day of January, 1896, for the purpose of holding the sessions of said court therein, and that during said period concurrent jurisdiction, so far as is necessary, over said property be, and the same is hereby, ceded to the State of Pennsylvania for said purposes, so that the sessions of said courts in said buildings and rooms may be, during said period, fully legalized: Provided, That the commissioners of each of said counties of Lackawanna and Lycoming shall pay to the United States each the sum of $500, to be made in five yearly payments, for the use of said rooms for the time aforesaid: And provided further, That said rooms shall be kept in good repair at the expense of the State of Pennsylvania, and that said commissioners shall further provide necessary light and heat for said rooms at their own expense, and at the end of said period of five years the use of said rooms shall be relinquished to the United States by the said State of Pennsylvania and the said superior court in as good condition as before the occupancy of said rooms by said court: Provided further, That the sessions of said superior court shall in no way interfere with the sessions of the said circuit and district courts of the United States.

Mr. SCRANTON. I desire to have a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read, and also a proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon granting unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution, pending which the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that a communication be read from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 12, 1895.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 11th instant, inclosing a draft of House resolution No. 8, relative to the use of the United States court room in the public building at Scranton and Williamsport, Pa., by the superior court of the State of Pennsylvania during certain months of each year, and requesting that the Department give its sanction to said measure. In reply I have the honor to advise you that, for reasons which you must appreciate, the Department can only express an opinion upon the merits of proposed bill or resolution at request of the Senate or the House, or the chairman of the committee to which it is referred. I have the honor to suggest, however, that the joint resolution be amended by the addition of a clause providing that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to terminate the permission granted upon thirty days' notice to the commissioners, in the event that the United States should need the premises, or in event of failure on the part of the commissioners or the State of Pennsylvania to comply with any of the conditions named in said resolution.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE, Acting Secretary.

Hon. J. A. SCRANTON,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, at any time to terminate this permit and the possession thereby granted of either or both of said premises upon thirty days' notice to the commissioners of the county wherein the same is situated; and on such termination all further payment therefor shall cease."

Mr. SAYERS. Allow me to state that a few days ago, when a similar resolution was offered, I objected to its consideration. The amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to offer to this Senate resolution obviates, I think, any objection. Therefore I do not object.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment as previously read was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SCRANTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COX, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes relative to ports of entry; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 30) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PORTS OF ENTRY, INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up from the Speaker's table, if permissible at this time, the House bill No. 803, with reference to certain ports of entry, which came over from the Senate this morning, with an amendment, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this would require unanimous consent, inasmuch as under the rule it would necessarily go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then, I would like to call it up by unanimous consent. This matter is one in which my colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, is interested, but he is absent from the House to-day, and asks me to call it up for him.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 803) to amend section 2601 of the Revised Statutes relative to ports of entry.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the Senate to the House bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 14, after the word "law," by inserting "Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal the provisions of the act approved August 7, 1882, which embraces East St. Louis, Ill., within the limits of the port of St. Louis, Mo."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate amendment to this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague, as I was not able to hear very well in this part of the Hall the reading of the amendment, if the bill, or the amendment of the Senate, would in any manner affect the existing status of the port of Cairo, Ill.?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No; it would not, as I am informed.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Then, that port would still exist as now under the general statutes, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to it at the present time?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, my understanding is, that although it attaches the State of Illinois, with the exception of East St. Louis, to the Chicago collection district, it makes no other change and does not interfere with Cairo as a port of delivery.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Well, this is a port of delivery. If my colleague can assure me of the fact that it is not interfered with under the operation of this bill I have no objection to the present consideration of it. Inasmuch as this is in my district, I would like to look carefully into the matter before consent is given, unless he can give me that assurance.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am informed that it does not make any change, excepting that to which I have referred. Our colleague, Mr. HOPKINS, passed it through the House by unanimous consent last week, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes; I happened to be out at the time, and do not know the exact conditions of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Where are the duties that may be collected at Cairo payable now?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The surveyor of the port attends to the duties pertaining to the office of the surveyor of a port of that character, and receives fees and a salary for performing the duties.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It does not change anything in the State of Illinois, except, as I understand it, collections made in the State of Illinois hereafter, which are now payable in New Orleans, will be payable in Chicago.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will you not allow this to rest until to-morrow, so that I may have an opportunity of looking into it?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well; I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the bill and it will go over.

STORING AND CLEANSING OF RICE.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a bill and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, and pending that I desire to offer an explanation to the House, which I think will lead to the granting of the consent and the passage of the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let the bill be reported first.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1647) to amend an act approved March 24, 1874, entitled "An act establishing bonded warehouses for storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation."

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

SECTION 1. That the act of Congress approved March 24, 1874, entitled "An act to provide bonded warehouses for the storing and cleansing of rice intended for exportation," be, and hereby is, amended by adding after the words "imported rice," the following words: "and for the curing and repacking of fish," so that the act will read as follows:

"That from and after the passage of this act importers' bonded warehouses, to be used for the storing and cleansing of imported rice, and for the curing and repacking of fish intended for exportation to foreign countries, may be established at any port of entry in the United States under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

Mr. MOODY. Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is presented to the House at the request of the Treasury Department. If it were intended to introduce any new practice in the Department in respect to the subject with which the bill deals, I would not ask present consideration; but I am informed that the practice which the bill seeks to legalize has been in existence in the Treasury Department for more than fifteen years, and it is only within a few weeks past that it has been discovered to be in violation of the existing law. The bill was intrusted to my care because of the fact that it affects almost exclusively the district in Massachusetts which I have the honor to represent on this floor.

There are at present, under the guidance and control of the Treasury Department, bonded warehouses for the precise purpose which this bill is intended to authorize, and, as I say, it is intended only to legalize a practice which has prevailed during several Administrations and for nearly a fifth of a century. The only reason why it can not take its ordinary course of reference to a committee is that it interrupts business which has been built up upon the faith of the legality of this practice, in which many men are employed and much capital is invested. The bill which has been introduced is word for word in accordance with a suggestion drawn in the Treasury Department and handed to me personally by Mr. Hamlin, one of the Assistant Secretaries. I trust that this explanation will be sufficient to permit the present consideration and passage of the bill which I offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LESTER. I shall be obliged to object to the consideration of this bill at present. It seems to involve matters which require consideration, and therefore I object.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. MOODY said: Mr. Speaker, I have been informed by the gentleman from Georgia that the objection which he interposed to the consideration of the bill relating to warehouses for fish was made under a misapprehension, and that he is prepared to withdraw it. I therefore still ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. LESTER. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the bill, and withdraw my objection to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The objection having been withdrawn, the bill having been read will not be reported again unless requested. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, as I understand it to be the case, in order that the House may fully understand what they are doing, has the Secretary of the Treasury recommended the passage of this bill?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Treasury not only recommends the passage of the bill, but the bill as presented is a draft, word for word, of a measure recommended by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that the sole object of this bill is to continue a practice which had prevailed under former constructions of importing from Canada certain kinds of fish, particularly herring, and preparing them in a bonded warehouse for the purpose of export simply. It only extends the law as it exists now with reference to bonded warehouses, and gives as a right a practice which has been carried on in fact for a great many years.

Mr. MOODY. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that is an exact statement of the case, with the exception of the nature of the fish, which I believe to be cod instead of herring.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it is largely composed of herring, but it may also be cod. The larger proportion of it, as I was informed by Mr. Hamlin, was herring. I think this legislation is entirely proper, and is simply extending a principle which has existed under all tariff laws for the last fifty years. I think the bill ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DINGLEY. One word. I noticed when the Clerk read the bill that it referred to the act of 1894 as the act of 1874. Was that simply an error in the reading, or is the bill incorrect? Is it the act of 1894 that is referred to?

The SPEAKER. The title reads 1874.

Mr. MOODY. Eighteen hundred and seventy-four is right. The act to which this is offered as an amendment is the act approved March 24, 1874.

Mr. DINGLEY. I had the impression it was the act of 1894 that it was desired to amend. But the gentleman has examined the matter, I suppose, and is correct.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and it was accordingly passed.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PROPOSED SURVEYS, GREAT LAKES.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the subsidence of the waters of the Great Lakes of the North has reached an alarming stage, reducing the depth of the water in the channels and harbors of said lakes to such a degree as to seriously interfere with navigation; and

Whereas great loss to those who are engaged in the carrying trade on these lakes is caused thereby, endangering their vessels and the lives of those who navigate them; and

Whereas the subsidence of the water has never been so great as at the present time, being a total of some 5 feet below the normal height; and

Whereas it has been proposed that a series of dams or jetties, constructed and maintained at or near the outlet of these several lakes, would necessarily raise the surface of said lakes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives any and all information that he may have bearing upon this subject.

Resolved, that he be directed to give an estimate of the cost of making a survey of the outlet of Lake Erie at the head of Niagara River, of the outlet of Lake St. Clair at the head of the Detroit River, and of the outlet of Lake Huron at the head of the St. Clair River, with a view to the construction of such dams, jetties, locks, and such other work as may be necessary for the proper carrying out of the object aimed at in these resolutions, it being understood that these surveys shall take into consideration the feasibility of such constructions, and whether they would accomplish the desired object of increasing the depth of water in the lakes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I submit that it would be better to have that go to a committee. It seems to me—living as I do near one of these great inland seas—that this resolution is so important, for mischief or for good, as the case may be, that it would be better to have it receive the consideration of the usual committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting, Mr. Speaker, but I rise to suggest to the gentleman introducing it that it would be better to change the form so as to request, if not incompatible with the public service, instead of direct. That is the usual form. It is questionable whether a simple resolution can direct. It can request.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that I was in consultation with General Craighill, Chief of Engineers, I believe, in the War Department, who has these matters in charge, and he suggested the word "direct." That was the reason I used it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I only make the suggestion because it is the usual form in these resolutions to request, instead of to direct, and I think it is well to conform to the custom.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McMILLIN. It is questionable whether anything short of a law can "direct" an officer of the Government. One branch of Congress can request, but the direction comes by law, and not by a simple resolution.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I will state to the gentleman that General Craighill explicitly stated that we have the power to direct the Secretary of War to furnish this information.

Mr. McMILLIN. Congress has the power to direct, and I am not going to abrogate any power I have as a member of the House, but it is the usual form. I shall not be captious about it, but I think the gentleman ought to put it in the usual form.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I will send up this letter from General Craighill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has objected. Does he withdraw his objection for that purpose?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think it is a resolution that may well receive the consideration of the proper committee. I do not think I will withdraw my objection, because on a mere reading of the resolution I would be required to make up my opinion about the propriety of entering upon this expenditure. It may be, and I presume is, very proper, but the rules are made for the reference of resolutions of this kind, in order to enable us to obtain the full information of one of the committees of the House. It seems to me that there is nothing to be gained by passing this resolution now rather than in January.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CUBA.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I send a paper to the desk which I ask to have read, and that, by unanimous consent, I then have an opportunity to make a few remarks.

The SPEAKER. What is the paper?

Mr. WILLIS. It is a petition from the Peace Society of Delaware touching the Cuban question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks to have a memorial from the Peace Society of Delaware read, and that he be permitted to make some remarks on the subject. The memorial will be read.

The memorial was read.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like the Speaker to state what the question is. I have just come in.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that there is no question.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I understand that the gentleman who has the floor sent up something to be read and that he desires then to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am informed, also, that the paper read refers to Cuba. I think that at the proper time we should take that up in the regular way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

BELLIGERENT RIGHTS TO CUBANS.

Mr. DOVENER. Mr. Speaker, by request, I send to the Clerk's desk a memorial and resolution adopted at a mass meeting in the city of Washington, and ask unanimous consent that it be read, and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the resolution and printing in the RECORD?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We do not know what it is.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman state what the subject is?

Mr. DOVENER. It is in favor of the recognition of and giving belligerent rights to the Cubans.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I could not hear the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. But I suggest that the matter had better take the regular course.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

ARMENIAN TROUBLES.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read and printed in the RECORD memorials and resolutions from two Brooklyn churches relative to the barbarities in Armenia, as practiced by the Turks. These resolutions come from two of the most prominent churches in Brooklyn, one from Christ's Church, with a membership of nearly 2,000, one of the oldest churches of that denomination, and the other from the South Third Street Presbyterian Church, the senior pastor of which is the honored president of the Foreign Board of Missions of the Presbyterian Church of the United States.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from New York propose—the consideration of the matter?

Mr. HOWE. I would like to have the petitions read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. And referred?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to have the memorials presented by him read, printed in the RECORD, and referred. Is there objection?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. To what subject do the memorials refer, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. They relate to the Armenian question.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think they had better be referred without reading.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The memorials will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word with regard to this matter. I look upon these not as resolutions, but as petitions coming up from the people——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made and the gentleman is not in order.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OGDEN, until after the holidays.

To Mr. COWEN, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. COBB of Alabama, to January 1 next, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBERT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. LAWSON, indefinitely, on account of very important business.

To Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, until after the holidays, on account of important business.

To Mr. WALKER of Virginia, for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. WOOMER, on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. EVANS, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 967) for the relief of Theodore Huseman, and it was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

On motion of Mr. JOY, the Committee on Claims was discharged from further consideration of the bill for the relief of William P. Buckmaster, and it was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. KEM, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John Tempany, Fifty-third Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in appointing the Committee on Accounts was misinformed as to the number, and will add to the committee Mr. BULL of Rhode Island and Mr. COBB of Missouri.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A joint resolution of the following title, having been duly enrolled, was signed by the Speaker:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 7) providing for the printing of the Monthly Summary Statement of Imports and Exports of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

The motion of Mr. DINGLEY was then agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 17, 1895.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Public Printer, transmitting, in compliance with law, the annual report of the operations of the Government Printing Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895; which was referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the National Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of the United States, praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at the fifth annual convention of the American International Association of Railway Superintendents of Bridges and Buildings, held at New Orleans, La., October 15, 1895, praying that an appropriation be made for the continuance of the investigations into the properties of wood and tests of the strength of our commercial timbers, which have been carried on in the division of forestry, Department of Agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kentucky, praying that steps be taken by Congress to prevent the companies operating the Etna and Sarah blast furnaces at Ironton, Ohio, from throwing furnace cinders over the north bank of the Ohio River, thereby diverting the flow of water of that river against the Kentucky shore; and also that provision be made for the construction of piers or wing dams at the upper end of the town of Russell, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KYLE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Madison, S. Dak., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHANDLER. I present the petition of the church of Dartmouth College, authenticated by Charles F. Emerson, clerk pro tempore of the church, in reference to the outrages in the Turkish Empire. The petitioners pray that Congress will take such prompt and resolute action as the occasion requires to protect the lives and property of all American citizens, whether native born or naturalized, resident in Turkey; to employ every legitimate influence and agency for the immediate arrest of the massacre and plunder of the Armenian race, and demand such reparation as the case may admit; and demand that henceforth the profession of Christianity shall in no case subject the professor to death, imprisonment, exile, or persecution, whether by the direction, permission, or neglect of the Turkish Government or its officials in any part of the Empire. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Newark, N. J., praying for a speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of Minnesota, praying for the relief of Josiah R. King. As a duplicate of this resolution was presented yesterday and entered in the RECORD it need not be reread. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of St. Paul, Minn., praying that the President and the Congress of the United States take immediate, definite, and vigorous action on behalf of the Armenian survivors; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GRAY presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by citizens of Wilmington, Del., praying Congress to inaugurate peaceful measures and send ambassadors of peace to those now engaged in bloody warfare in, and with reference to, the Island of Cuba, and to use their utmost endeavors to compose by peaceful consultation and arbitrament the existing dispute; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 21) for printing extra copies of the report of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, to report a concurrent resolution in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, in paper covers, 6,000 extra copies of the annual report of the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy at West Point for the year 1895, of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROFESSOR WOODBRIDGE'S REPORT ON HEATING AND VENTILATION.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the report of Prof. L. H. Woodbridge, made to the Committee on Rules of the Senate, on the heating and ventilation of the Senate, with the accompanying illustrations, dated December 14, 1895, 500 copies for the use of the Senate; but the usual number shall not be printed.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. This is a report made by Professor Woodbridge, who was selected by the Committee on Rules under a resolution offered, I think, by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in the last Congress. The committee are not yet ready to report, but they think that this report of Professor Woodbridge is so valuable and contains so much information that it ought to be printed in advance for the use of the Senate. I think every Senator will not only be interested in the matter, but instructed by it, and he will find that it is probably the most valuable report that has ever been made upon the subject of the ventilation of these Halls.

Mr. HOAR. I have seen the plan which accompanies the report and I heard the eminent scientific man before the committee generally stating his theory. I would suggest that there ought to be enough copies of the report printed to send at least one to every member of the other House, because, although the investigation is confined to the Senate wing of the Capitol, it relates as intimately to the comfort and health of members of the other House, and if the plan shall be adopted here, undoubtedly it will be adopted there. I suggest that the number of copies be increased to 1,000, so that the report may be generally understood. Besides, of course any appropriation which is made for this purpose will require the assent of the other House.

Mr. GORMAN. The only trouble is that under the law neither House can order the printing of additional copies when the cost exceeds $500 without concurrent action. We have had a general estimate made of the cost in this case, which may not be exactly accurate, but as soon as the Committee on Rules reports the usual number will be ordered printed by both Houses.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; as this is a Senate resolution and comes under the $500 limit, I shall not insist.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 26) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1895, on the 20th day of said month, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1025) for the relief of William Mickler; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1026) for the relief of the widow and heirs of Cyprian T. Jenkins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1027) for a survey and estimate for a railroad from the mainland to Key West, Fla., and for a canal connecting the same with the St. Johns River, for military and naval purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1028) granting land warrants to soldiers and sailors in the United States service in the Seminole Indian war of 1856, and their widows and orphans; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1029) confirming titles to certain lands in Columbia County, State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1030) to require preference to be given to citizens of the States and localities where the mails are to be carried in all mail lettings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1031) for the relief of Jane Latham Donelly, only surviving daughter and heir of Amos Latham, a soldier of the Revolutionary war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1032) to regulate the natural laws of supply and demand, and to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of revenue; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1033) for the relief of the legal representatives of Hampton L. Lee, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 29) to print, with certain additions, the last map of the United States published by the Interior Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 30) concerning scrip location on the Fort Jupiter Reservation, in Florida, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 31) concerning swamp and overflowed land in Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HILL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James Riley be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BRICE, it was Ordered, That Philip Hawk be permitted to withdraw any papers of his on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate not inconsistent with the rules of the Senate, and that the Secretary be directed to forward them to his address at Canton, Ohio.

REPRINT OF DOCUMENT ON THE VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY.

Mr. HALE. I submit a resolve, and ask for action upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a reprint shall be made of Senate Document No. 226, first session Fiftieth Congress, relating to the Venezuela boundary, to be distributed among the members of the Senate for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. This is an old document touching the Venezuela boundary question, and it is out of print. The object of the reprint is that the number fixed by statute may be given to the Senate for distribution here. It will not go in the ordinary way to the Departments, but follows the action of another branch of Congress on the same subject yesterday.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

LOANS, CURRENCY, AND COINAGE.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing cause to have printed as miscellaneous documents the following matter:

First. A paper entitled "National loans of the United States from 1776 to 1881," compiled by Raphael A. Bayley, and published in the reports of the Tenth Census.

Second. Laws relating to loans, currency, and coinage of the United States, heretofore printed by direction of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the last part of the resolution again read. It would require the publication of a large volume——

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will again be read for information.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Kansas will see that it is necessary to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing, because it would require the publication of a large volume, which was ordered printed last year and which is, I believe, accessible to anyone. At any rate, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PEFFER. Before the reference is made I wish to state that I think the Senator from Ohio is probably in error as to the quantity of matter contained in the second item referred to.

Mr. SHERMAN. It embraces all the loan laws and all laws relating to currency and coinage.

Mr. PEFFER. That is true, but I wish to say to the Senator that the volume referred to is but a small one; probably it does not exceed 100 pages. But there was another volume which included a great deal of extraneous matter, matter that I do not care about including in this resolution. This volume does not, I think, exceed 100 pages.

The first item referred to is one of the most valuable documents in our financial history. It was prepared, under the direction of the Superintendent of the Tenth Census, by a gentleman of eminent qualifications, Mr. Bayley, and was printed in the reports of the census for 1880, but is wholly out of print, except, perhaps, a very few copies that may be found with some officers of the Treasury Department. I have a great many requests for both of these documents. I have no objection to the resolutiou being referred to the Committee on Printing for its report.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with this matter I desire to express the hope that the committee will not order simply a reprint of the history of loans. It ought to be complete before it is published again, and it is not now complete. It ought to bring the loans down to date. The document heretofore printed does not bring them down to date. It ought to contain the disposition of the loans, at what rate and when they were disposed of, and such data. All that information is in the Treasury Department, and it should be put in this volume. It can be added to this compilation of the Senate. In addition, the document should contain the coinage laws, and all the laws in regard to loans and currency. There is one volume published that brings down the laws relating to loans, currency, banking, etc., until 1878 or 1879. They ought to be brought down to date. The coinage laws alone are embraced in the publication of 1894, entitled "The coinage laws," but there is a great mass in that volume which is of no service, while that publication does not contain the laws in regard to loans and currency. All ought to be embraced in one volume. I hope the Committee on Printing will take hold of this matter and order all the laws to be printed in one volume, bringing them down to the existing date, and then the book will be worth something.

Mr. PEFFER. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri a very good one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read, printed, and lie over under the rule until to-morrow morning.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate, who shall be charged with the duty of investigating the subject of organized efforts of corporations, or of the president and directors thereof, to control the election of members of Congress or to influence the legislation of Congress; also to investigate and report to the Senate whether corrupt means, bribery, or free transportation has been or is being used to influence such elections; also to inquire and report to the Senate whether the use of such influences or means is consistent with the preservation of the Republic of the United States and the rights and liberties of the people, and to report a bill for the punishment or suppression of such practices.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

THE BOARD OF IRRIGATION.

Mr. KYLE. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate a report of progress of the Board of Irrigation, Executive Departments, including a statement of its organization, the existing legislation relative to irrigation, the operations of the various subdivisions, the principles which should govern subdivision, and list of official publications on irrigation.

Mr. KYLE. I understand this document is already prepared by the Department of the Interior, and it will be a very valuable one indeed for the Committee on Irrigation in its deliberations upon the subject during the session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the Congress:

In my annual message addressed to the Congress on the 3d instant I called attention to the pending boundary controversy between Great Britain and the Republic of Venezuela, and recited the substance of a representation made by this Government to Her Britannic Majesty's Government suggesting reasons why such dispute should be submitted to arbitration for settlement and inquiring whether it would be so submitted.

The answer of the British Government, which was then awaited, has since been received, and, together with the dispatch to which it is a reply, is hereto appended.

Such reply is embodied in two communications addressed by the British prime minister to Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British ambassador at this capital. It will be seen that one of these communications is devoted exclusively to observations upon the Monroe doctrine, and claims that in the present instance a new and strange extension and development of this doctrine is insisted on by the United States, that the reasons justifying an appeal to the doctrine enunciated by President Monroe are generally inapplicable "to the state of things in which we live at the present day," and especially inapplicable to a controversy involving the boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela.

Without attempting extended argument in reply to these positions, it may not be amiss to suggest that the doctrine upon which we stand is strong and sound because its enforcement is important to our peace and safety as a nation, and is essential to the integrity of our free institutions and the tranquil maintenance of our distinctive form of government. It was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and can not become obsolete while our Republic endures. If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the Governments of the Old World and a subject for our absolute noninterference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government.

Assuming, therefore, that we may properly insist upon this doctrine without regard to "the state of things in which we live," or any changed conditions here or elsewhere, it is not apparent why its application may not be invoked in the present controversy.

If a European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring Republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why, to that extent, such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken. This is the precise action which President Monroe declared to be "dangerous to our peace and safety," and it can make no difference whether the European system is extended by an advance of frontier or otherwise.

It is also suggested in the British reply that we should not seek to apply the Monroe doctrine to the pending dispute because it does not embody any principle of international law which "is founded on the general consent of nations," and that "no statesman, however eminent, and no nation, however powerful, are competent to insert into the code of international law a novel principle which was never recognized before, and which has not since been accepted by the Government of any other country."

Practically, the principle for which we contend has peculiar, if not exclusive, relation to the United States. It may not have been admitted in so many words to the code of international law, but since in international councils every nation is entitled to the rights belonging to it, if the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine is something we may justly claim, it has its place in the code of international law as certainly and as securely as if it were specifically mentioned, and when the United States is a suitor before the high tribunal that administers international law the question to be determined is whether or not we present claims which the justice of that code of law can find to be right and valid.

The Monroe doctrine finds its recognition in those principles of international law which are based upon the theory that every nation shall have its rights protected and its just claims enforced.

Of course this Government is entirely confident that under the sanction of this doctrine we have clear rights and undoubted claims. Nor is this ignored in the British reply. The prime minister, while not admitting that the Monroe doctrine is applicable to present conditions, states: "In declaring that the United States would resist any such enterprise if it was contemplated President Monroe adopted a policy which received the entire sympathy of the English Government of that date." He further declares: "Though the language of President Monroe is directed to the attainment of objects which most Englishmen would agree to be salutary, it is impossible to admit that they have been inscribed by any adequate authority in the code of international law."

Again he says: "They (Her Majesty's Government) fully concur with the view which President Monroe apparently entertained, that any disturbance of the existing territorial distribution in that hemisphere by any fresh acquisitions on the part of any European State would be a highly inexpedient change."

In the belief that the doctrine for which we contend was clear and definite, that it was founded upon substantial considerations and involved our safety and welfare, that it was fully applicable to our present conditions and to the state of the world's progress, and that it was directly related to the pending controversy, and without any conviction as to the final merits of the dispute, but anxious to learn in a satisfactory and conclusive manner whether Great Britain sought, under a claim of boundary, to extend her possessions on this continent without right, or whether she merely sought possession of territory fairly included within her lines of ownership, this Government proposed to the Government of Great Britain a resort to arbitration as the proper means of settling the question, to the end that a vexatious boundary dispute between the two contestants might be determined and our exact standing and relation in respect to the controversy might be made clear.

It will be seen from the correspondence herewith submitted that this proposition has been declined by the British Government, upon grounds which, in the circumstances, seem to me to be far from satisfactory. It is deeply disappointing that such an appeal, actuated by the most friendly feelings toward both nations directly concerned, addressed to the sense of justice and to the magnanimity of one of the great powers of the world and touching its relations to one comparatively weak and small, should have produced no better results.

The course to be pursued by this Government, in view of the present condition, does not appear to admit of serious doubt. Having labored faithfully for many years to induce Great Britain to submit this dispute to impartial arbitration, and having been now finally apprised of her refusal to do so, nothing remains but to accept the situation, to recognize its plain requirements, and deal with it accordingly. Great Britain's present proposition has never thus far been regarded as admissible by Venezuela, though any adjustment of the boundary which that country may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will can not of course be objected to by the United States.

Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. The inquiry to that end should of course be conducted carefully and judicially, and due weight should be given to all available evidence, records, and facts in support of the claims of both parties.

In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela.

In making these recommendations I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred, and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow.

I am, nevertheless, firm in my conviction that while it is a grievous thing to contemplate the two great English-speaking peoples of the world as being otherwise than friendly competitors in the onward march of civilization and strenuous and worthy rivals in all the arts of peace, there is no calamity which a great nation can invite which equals that which follows a supine submission to wrong and injustice and the consequent loss of national self-respect and honor, beneath which are shielded and defended a people's safety and greatness.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 17, 1895.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The Vice-President rapped to order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the message, with the accompanying documents, be printed. I shall not move a reference until after the message and accompanying documents shall have been printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that accompanying the message is the correspondence, and if not too long, I think it would be well if that could be read, or spread upon the records at once.

Mr. GRAY and Mr. VILAS. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, so that we may read Secretary Olney's dispatch of last July and Lord Salisbury's reply. I think we ought to be in a position to understand this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the accompanying correspondence also be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

The following are the documents accompanying the message of the President:

MR. OLNEY TO MR. BAYARD.

No. 804.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 20, 1895.

His Excellency THOMAS F. BAYARD, etc., London.

SIR: I am directed by the President to communicate to you his views upon a subject to which he has given much anxious thought and respecting which he has not reached a conclusion without a lively sense of its great importance as well as of the serious responsibility involved in any action now to be taken.

It is not proposed, and for present purposes is not necessary, to enter into any detailed account of the controversy between Great Britain and Venezuela respecting the western frontier of the colony of British Guiana. The dispute is of ancient date and began at least as early as the time when Great Britain acquired by the treaty with the Netherlands of 1814 "the establishments of Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice." From that time to the present the dividing line between these "establishments" (now called British Guiana) and Venezuela has never ceased to be a subject of contention. The claims of both parties, it must be conceded, are of a somewhat indefinite nature. On the one hand Venezuela, in every constitution of government since she became an independent State, has declared her territorial limits to be those of the Captaincy General of Venezuela in 1810. Yet, out of "moderation and prudence," it is said, she has contented herself with claiming the Essequibo line—the line of the Essequibo River, that is—to be the true boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana. On the other hand, at least an equal degree of indefiniteness distinguishes the claim of Great Britain.

It does not seem to be asserted, for instance, that in 1814 the "establishments" then acquired by Great Britain had any clearly defined western limits which can now be identified and which are either the limits insisted upon to-day, or, being the original limits, have been the basis of legitimate territorial extensions. On the contrary, having the actual possession of a district called the Pomaron district, she apparently remained indifferent as to the exact area of the colony until 1840, when she commissioned an engineer, Sir Robert Schomburgk, to examine and lay down its boundaries. The result was the Schomburgk line, which was fixed by metes and bounds, was delineated on maps, and was at first indicated on the face of the country itself by posts, monograms, and other like symbols.

If it was expected that Venezuela would acquiesce in this line, the expectation was doomed to speedy disappointment. Venezuela at once protested, and with such vigor and to such purpose that the line was explained to be only tentative—part of a general boundary scheme concerning Brazil and the Netherlands as well as Venezuela—and the monuments of the line set up by Schomburgk were removed by the express order of Lord Aberdeen. Under these circumstances it seems impossible to treat the Schomburgk line as being the boundary claimed by Great Britain as matter of right, or as anything but a line originating in considerations of convenience and expediency. Since 1840 various other boundary lines have from time to time been indicated by Great Britain, but all as conventional lines—lines to which Venezuela's assent has been desired, but which in no instance, it is believed, have been demanded as matter of right. Thus neither of the parties is to-day standing for the boundary line predicated upon strict legal right—Great Britain having formulated no such claim at all, while Venezuela insists upon the Essequibo line only as a liberal concession to her antagonist.

Several other features of the situation remain to be briefly noticed—the continuous growth of the undefined British claim, the fate of the various attempts at arbitration of the controversy, and the part in the matter heretofore taken by the United States. As already seen, the exploitation of the Schomburgk line in 1840 was at once followed by the protest of Venezuela and by proceedings on the part of Great Britain which could fairly be interpreted only as a disavowal of that line. Indeed, in addition to the facts already noticed, Lord Aberdeen himself in 1844 proposed a line beginning at the River Moroco, a distinct abandonment of the Schomburgk line.

Notwithstanding this, however, every change in the British claim since that time has moved the frontier of British Guiana farther and farther to the westward of the line thus proposed. The Granville line of 1881 placed the starting point at a distance of 29 miles from the Moroco in the direction of Punta Barima. The Rosebery line of 1886 placed it west of the Guaima River, and about that time, if the British authority known as the Statesman's Year Book is to be relied upon, the area of British Guiana was suddenly enlarged by some 33,000 square miles—being stated as 76,000 square miles in 1885 and 109,000 square miles in 1887. The Salisbury line of 1890 fixed the starting point of the line in the mouth of the Amacuro west of the Punta Barima on the Orinoco. And finally, in 1893, a second Rosebery line carried the boundary from a point to the west of the Amacuro as far as the source of the Cumano River and the Sierra of Usupamo. Nor have the various claims thus enumerated been claims on paper merely. An exercise of jurisdiction corresponding more or less to such claims has accompanied or followed closely upon each and has been the more irritating and unjustifiable if, as is alleged, an agreement made in the year 1850 bound both parties to refrain from such occupation pending the settlement of the dispute.

While the British claim has been developing in the manner above described, Venezuela has made earnest and repeated efforts to have the question of boundary settled. Indeed, allowance being made for the distractions of a war of independence and for frequent internal revolutions, it may be fairly said that Venezuela has never ceased to strive for its adjustment. It could, of course, do so only through peaceful methods, any resort to force as against its powerful adversary being out of the question. Accordingly, shortly after the drawing of the Schomburgk line, an effort was made to settle the boundary by treaty and was apparently progressing toward a successful issue when the negotiations were brought to an end in 1844 by the death of the Venezuelan plenipotentiary.

In 1848 Venezuela entered upon a period of civil commotions which lasted for more than a quarter of a century, and the negotiations thus interrupted in 1844 were not resumed until 1876. In that year Venezuela offered to close the dispute by accepting the Moroco line proposed by Lord Aberdeen. But, without giving reasons for his refusal, Lord Granville rejected the proposal and suggested a new line comprehending a large tract of territory all pretension to which seemed to have been abandoned by the previous action of Lord Aberdeen. Venezuela refused to assent to it, and negotiations dragged along without result until 1882, when Venezuela concluded that the only course open to her was arbitration of the controversy. Before she had made any definite proposition, however, Great Britain took the initiative by suggesting the making of a treaty which should determine various other questions as well as that of the disputed boundary. The result was that a treaty was practically agreed upon with the Gladstone government in 1886 containing a general arbitration clause under which the parties might have submitted the boundary dispute to the decision of a third power or of several powers in amity with both.

Before the actual signing of the treaty, however, the administration of Mr. Gladstone was superseded by that of Lord Salisbury, which declined to accede to the arbitration clause of the treaty notwithstanding the reasonable expectations of Venezuela to the contrary, based upon the premier's emphatic declaration in the House of Lords that no serious government would think of not respecting the engagements of its predecessor. Since then Venezuela on the one side has been offering and calling for arbitration, while Great Britain on the other has responded by insisting upon the condition that any arbitration should relate only to such of the disputed territory as lies west of a line designated by herself. As this condition seemed inadmissible to Venezuela, and as, while the negotiations were pending, new appropriations of what is claimed to be Venezuelan territory continued to be made, Venezuela in 1887 suspended diplomatic relations with Great Britain, protesting "before Her British Majesty's Government, before all civilized nations, and before the world in general, against the acts of spoliation committed to her detriment by the Government of Great Britain, which she at no time and on no account will recognize as capable of altering in the least the rights which she has inherited from Spain and respecting which she will ever be willing to submit to the decision of a third power."

Diplomatic relations have not since been restored, though what is claimed to be new and flagrant British aggressions forced Venezuela to resume negotiations on the boundary question—in 1890, through its minister in Paris and a special envoy on that subject; and in 1893, through a confidential agent, Señor Michelena. These negotiations, however, met with the fate of other like previous negotiations, Great Britain refusing to arbitrate except as to territory west of an arbitrary line drawn by herself. All attempts in that direction definitely terminated in October, 1893, when Señor Michelena filed with the foreign office the following declaration:

"I perform a most strict duty in raising again, in the name of the Government of Venezuela, a most solemn protest against the proceedings of the Colony of British Guiana, constituting encroachments upon the territory of the Republic, and against the declaration contained in your excellency's communication that Her Britannic Majesty's Government considers that part of the territory as pertaining to British Guiana and admits no claim to it on the part of Venezuela. In support of this protest I reproduce all the arguments presented to your excellency in my note of 29th of last September and those which have been exhibited by the Government of Venezuela on the various occasions they have raised the same protest.

"I lay on Her Britannic Majesty's Government the entire responsibility of the incidents that may arise in the future from the necessity to which Venezuela has been driven to oppose by all possible means the dispossession of a part of her territory, for by disregarding her just representation to put an end to this violent state of affairs through the decision of arbiters Her Majesty's Government ignores her rights and imposes upon her the painful though peremptory duty of providing for her own legitimate defense."

To the territorial controversy between Great Britain and the Republic of Venezuela, thus briefly outlined, the United States has not been and, indeed, in view of its traditional policy, could not be indifferent. The note to the British foreign office by which Venezuela opened negotiations in 1876 was at once communicated to this Government. In January, 1881, a letter of the Venezuelan minister at Washington, respecting certain alleged demonstrations at the mouth of the Orinoco, was thus answered by Mr. Evarts, then Secretary of State:

"In reply I have to inform you that in view of the deep interest which the Government of the United States takes in all transactions tending to attempted encroachments of foreign powers upon the territory of any of the Republics of this continent, this Government could not look with indifference to the forcible acquisition of such territory by England if the mission of the vessels now at the mouth of the Orinoco should be found to be for that end. This Government awaits, therefore, with natural concern the more particular statements promised by the Government of Venezuela, which it hopes will not be long delayed."

In the February following Mr. Evarts wrote again on the same subject, as follows:

"Referring to your note of the 21st of December last, touching the operations of certain British war vessels in and near the mouth of the Orinoco River and to my reply thereto of the 31st ultimo, as well as to the recent occasions in which the subject has been mentioned in our conferences concerning the business of your mission, I take it to be fitting now at the close of my incumbency of the office I hold to advert to the interest with which the Government of the United States can not fail to regard any such purpose with respect to the control of American territory as is stated to be contemplated by the Government of Great Britain, and to express my regret that the further information promised in your note with regard to such designs had not reached me in season to receive the attention which, notwithstanding the severe pressure of public business at the end of an administrative term, I should have taken pleasure in bestowing upon it. I doubt not, however, that your representations in fulfillment of the awaited additional orders of your Government will have like earnest and solicitous consideration at the hands of my successor."

In November, 1882, the then state of negotiations with Great Britain, together with a copy of an intended note suggesting recourse to arbitration, was communicated to the Secretary of State by the President of Venezuela with the expression of the hope that the United States would give him its opinion and advice and such support as it deemed possible to offer Venezuela in order that justice should be done her. Mr. Frelinghuysen replied in a dispatch to the United States minister at Caracas as follows:

"This Government has already expressed its view that arbitration of such disputes is a convenient resort in the case of failure to come to a mutual understanding, and intimated its willingness, if Venezuela should so desire, to propose to Great Britain such a mode of settlement. It is felt that the tender of good offices would not be so profitable if the United States were to approach Great Britain as the advocate of any prejudged solution in favor of Venezuela. So far as the United States can counsel and assist Venezuela it believes it best to confine its reply to the renewal of the suggestion of arbitration and the offer of all its good offices in that direction. This suggestion is the more easily made, since it appears, from the instruction sent by Señor Seijas to the Venezuelan minister in London on the same 15th of July, 1882, that the President of Venezuela proposed to the British Government the submission of the dispute to arbitration by a third power.

"You will take an early occasion to present the foregoing considerations to Señor Seijas, saying to him that, while trusting that the direct proposal for arbitration already made to Great Britain may bear good fruit (if, indeed, it has not already done so by its acceptance in principle), the Government of the United States will cheerfully lend any needful aid to press upon Great Britain in a friendly way the proposition so made, and at the same time you will say to Señor Seijas (in personal conference, and not with the formality of a written communication) that the United States, while advocating strongly the recourse of arbitration for the adjustment of international disputes affecting the States of America, does not seek to put itself forward as their arbiter; that, viewing all such questions impartially and with no intent or desire to prejudge their merits, the United States will not refuse its arbitration if asked by both parties, and that, regarding all such questions as essentially and distinctively American, the United States would always prefer to see such contentions adjusted through the arbitrament of an American rather than an European power."

In 1884 Gen. Guzman Blanco, the Venezuelan minister to England, appointed with special reference to pending negotiations for a general treaty with Great Britain, visited Washington on his way to London and, after several conferences with the Secretary of State respecting the objects of his mission, was thus commended to the good offices of Mr. Lowell, our minister at St. James's:

"It will necessarily be somewhat within your discretion how far your good offices may be profitably employed with Her Majesty's Government to these ends, and at any rate you may take proper occasion to let Lord Granville know that we are not without concern as to whatever may affect the interests of a sister Republic of the American Continent and its position in the family of nations.

"If General Guzman should apply to you for advice or assistance in realizing the purposes of his mission you will show him proper consideration, and, without committing the United States to any determinate political solution, you will endeavor to carry out the views of this instruction."

The progress of General Guzman's negotiations did not fail to be observed by this Government, and in December, 1886, with a view to preventing the rupture of diplomatic relations—which actually took place in February following—the then Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, instructed our minister to Great Britain to tender the arbitration of the United States, in the following terms:

"It does not appear that at any time heretofore the good offices of this Government have been actually tendered to avert a rupture between Great Britain and Venezuela. As intimated in my No. 58, our inaction in this regard would seem to be due to the reluctance of Venezuela to have the Government of the United States take any steps having relation to the action of the British Government which might, in appearance even, prejudice the resort to further arbitration or mediation which Venezuela desired. Nevertheless, the records abundantly testify our friendly concern in the adjustment of the dispute; and the intelligence now received warrants me in tendering through you to Her Majesty's Government the good offices of the United States to promote an amicable settlement of the respective claims of Great Britain and Venezuela in the premises.

"As proof of the impartiality with which we view the question, we offer our arbitration, if acceptable to both countries. We do this with the less hesitancy as the dispute turns upon simple and readily ascertainable historical facts.

"Her Majesty's Government will readily understand that this attitude of friendly neutrality and entire impartiality touching the merits of the controversy, consisting wholly in a difference of facts between our friends and neighbors, is entirely consistent and compatible with the sense of responsibility that rests upon the United States in relation to the South American Republics. The doctrines we announced two generations ago, at the instance and with the moral support and approval of the British Government, have lost none of their force or importance in the progress of time, and the Governments of Great Britain and the United States are equally interested in conserving a status the wisdom of which has been demonstrated by the experience of more than half a century.

"It is proper, therefore, that you should convey to Lord Iddesleigh, in such sufficiently guarded terms as your discretion may dictate, the satisfaction that would be felt by the Government of the United States in perceiving that its wishes in this regard were permitted to have influence with Her Majesty's Government."

This offer of mediation was declined by Great Britain, with the statement that a similar offer had already been received from another quarter, and that the Queen's Government were still not without hope of a settlement by direct diplomatic negotiations. In February, 1888, having been informed that the governor of British Guiana had by formal decree laid claim to the territory traversed by the route of a proposed railway from Ciudad Bolivar to Guacipati, Mr. Bayard addressed a note to our minister to England, from which the following extracts are taken:

"The claim now stated to have been put forth by the authorities of British Guiana necessarily gives rise to grave disquietude, and creates an apprehension that the territorial claim does not follow historical traditions or evidence, but is apparently indefinite. At no time hitherto does it appear that the district of which Guacipati is the center has been claimed as British territory or that such jurisdiction has ever been asserted over its inhabitants, and if the reported decree of the governor of British Guiana be indeed genuine it is not apparent how any line of railway from Ciudad Bolivar to Guacipati could enter or traverse territory within the control of Great Britain.

"It is true that the line claimed by Great Britain as the western boundary of British Guiana is uncertain and vague. It is only necessary to examine the British Colonial Office List for a few years back to perceive this. In the issue for 1877, for instance, the line runs nearly southwardly from the mouth of the Amacuro to the junction of the Cotinga and Takutu rivers. In the issue of 1887, ten years later, it makes a wide detour to the westward, following the Yuruari. Guacipati lies considerably to the westward of the line officially claimed in 1887, and it may perhaps be instructive to compare with it the map which doubtless will be found in the Colonial Office List for the present year.

"It may be well for you to express anew to Lord Salisbury the great gratification it would afford this Government to see the Venezuelan dispute amicably and honorably settled by arbitration or otherwise and our readiness to do anything we properly can to assist to that end.

"In the course of your conversation you may refer to the publication in the London Financier, of January 24 (a copy of which you can procure and exhibit to Lord Salisbury), and express apprehension lest the widening pretensions of British Guiana to possess territory over which Venezuela's jurisdiction has never heretofore been disputed may not diminish the chances for a practical settlement.

"If, indeed, it should appear that there is no fixed limit to the British boundary claim, our good disposition to aid in a settlement might not only be defeated, but be obliged to give place to a feeling of grave concern."

In 1889, information having been received that Barima, at the mouth of the Orinoco, had been declared a British port, Mr. Blaine, then Secretary of State, authorized Mr. White to confer with Lord Salisbury for the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Venezuela on the basis of a temporary restoration of the status quo, and May 1 and May 6, 1890, sent the following telegrams to our minister to England, Mr. Lincoln:

(May 1, 1890)—

"Mr. Lincoln is instructed to use his good offices with Lord Salisbury to bring about the resumption of diplomatic intercourse between Great Britain and Venezuela as a preliminary step toward the settlement of the boundary dispute by arbitration. The joint proposals of Great Britain and the United States toward Portugal, which have just been brought about, would seem to make the present time propitious for submitting this question to an international arbitration. He is requested to propose to Lord Salisbury, with a view to an accommodation, that an informal conference be had in Washington or in London of representatives of the three powers. In such conference the position of the United States is one solely of impartial friendship toward both litigants.

"(May 6, 1890)—

"It is nevertheless desired that you shall do all you can consistently with our attitude of impartial friendship to induce some accord between the contestants by which the merits of the controversy may be fairly ascertained and the rights of each party justly confirmed. The neutral position of this Government does not comport with any expression of opinion on the part of this Department as to what these rights are, but it is confident that the shifting footing on which the British boundary question has rested for several years past is an obstacle to such a correct appreciation of the nature and grounds of her claim as would alone warrant the formation of any opinion."

In the course of the same year, 1890, Venezuela sent to London a special envoy to bring about the resumption of diplomatic relations with Great Britain through the good offices of the United States minister. But the mission failed because a condition of such resumption, steadily adhered to by Venezuela, was the reference of the boundary dispute to arbitration. Since the close of the negotiations initiated by Señor Michelena in 1893 Venezuela has repeatedly brought the controversy to the notice of the United States, has insisted upon its importance to the United States, as well as to Venezuela, has represented it to have reached an acute stage—making definite action by the United States imperative—and has not ceased to solicit the services and support of the United States in aid of its final adjustment. These appeals have not been received with indifference, and our ambassador to Great Britain has been uniformly instructed to exert all his influence in the direction of the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Venezuela and in favor of arbitration of the boundary controversy. The Secretary of State in a communication to Mr. Bayard, bearing date July 13, 1894, used the following language:

"The President is inspired by a desire for a peaceable and honorable settlement of the existing difficulties between an American State and a powerful transatlantic nation, and would be glad to see the reestablishment of such diplomatic relations between them as would promote that end.

"I can discern but two equitable solutions of the present controversy. One is the arbitral determination of the rights of the disputants as the respective successors to the historical rights of Holland and Spain over the region in question. The other is to create a new boundary line in accordance with the dictates of mutual expediency and consideration. The two Governments having so far been unable to agree on a conventional line, the consistent and conspicuous advocacy by the United States and England of the principle of arbitration and their recourse thereto in settlement of important questions arising between them, makes such a mode of adjustment especially appropriate in the present instance, and this Government will gladly do what it can to further a determination in that sense."

Subsequent communications to Mr. Bayard direct him to ascertain whether a minister from Venezuela would be received by Great Britain. In the annual message to Congress, of December 3 last, the President used the following language:

"The boundary of British Guiana still remains in dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela. Believing that its early settlement, on some just basis alike honorable to both parties, is in the line of our established policy to remove from this hemisphere all causes of difference with powers beyond the sea, I shall renew the efforts heretofore made to bring about a restoration of diplomatic relations between the disputants and to induce a reference to arbitration, a resort which Great Britain so conspicuously favors in principle and respects in practice, and which is earnestly sought by her weaker adversary."

And February 22, 1895, a joint resolution of Congress declared—

"That the President's suggestion * * * that Great Britain and Venezuela refer their dispute as to boundaries to friendly arbitration be earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of both parties in interest."

The important features of the existing situation, as shown by the foregoing recital, may be briefly stated.

1. The title to territory of indefinite but confessedly very large extent is in dispute between Great Britain on the one hand and the South American Republic of Venezuela on the other.

2. The disparity in the strength of the claimants is such that Venezuela can hope to establish her claim only through peaceful methods—through an agreement with her adversary either upon the subject itself or upon an arbitration.

3. The controversy, with varying claims on the part of Great Britain, has existed for more than half a century, during which period many earnest and persistent efforts of Venezuela to establish a boundary by agreement have proved unsuccessful.

4. The futility of the endeavor to obtain a conventional line being recognized, Venezuela for a quarter of a century has asked and striven for arbitration.

5. Great Britain, however, has always and continuously refused to arbitrate, except upon the condition of a renunciation of a large part of the Venezuelan claim and of a concession to herself of a large share of the territory in controversy.

6. By the frequent interposition of its good offices at the instance of Venezuela, by constantly urging and promoting the restoration of diplomatic relations between the two countries, by pressing for arbitration of the disputed boundary, by offering to act as arbitrator, by expressing its grave concern whenever new alleged instances of British aggression upon Venezuelan territory have been brought to its notice, the Government of the United States has made it clear to Great Britain and to the world that the controversy is one in which both its honor and its interests are involved and the continuance of which it can not regard with indifference.

The accuracy of the foregoing analysis of the existing status can not, it is believed, be challenged. It shows that status to be such that those charged with the interests of the United States are now forced to determine exactly what those interests are and what course of action they require. It compels them to decide to what extent, if any, the United States may and should intervene in a controversy between and primarily concerning only Great Britain and Venezuela, and to decide how far it is bound to see that the integrity of Venezuelan territory is not impaired by the pretensions of its powerful antagonist. Are any such right and duty devolved upon the United States? If not, the United States has already done all, if not more than all, that a purely sentimental interest in the affairs of the two countries justifies, and to push its interposition further would be unbecoming and undignified, and might well subject it to the charge of impertinent intermeddling with affairs with which it has no rightful concern. On the other hand, if any such right and duty exist, their due exercise and discharge will not permit of any action that shall not be efficient and that, if the power of the United States is adequate, shall not result in the accomplishment of the end in view. The question thus presented, as matter of principle, and regard being had to the settled national policy, does not seem difficult of solution. Yet the momentous practical consequences dependent upon its determination require that it should be carefully considered and that the grounds of the conclusion arrived at should be fully and frankly stated.

That there are circumstances under which a nation may justly interpose in a controversy to which two or more other nations are the direct and immediate parties is an admitted canon of international law. The doctrine is ordinarily expressed in terms of the most general character, and is perhaps incapable of more specific statement. It is declared in substance that a nation may avail itself of this right whenever what is done or proposed by any of the parties primarily concerned is a serious and direct menace to its own integrity, tranquillity, or welfare. The propriety of the rule, when applied in good faith, will not be questioned in any quarter. On the other hand, it is an inevitable though unfortunate consequence of the wide scope of the rule that it has only too often been made a cloak for schemes of wanton spoliation and aggrandizement. We are concerned at this time, however, not so much with the general rule as with a form of it which is peculiarly and distinctively American. Washington, in the solemn admonitions of the Farewell Address, explicitly warned his countrymen against entanglements with the politics or the controversies of European powers.

"Europe," he said, "has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course."

During the Administration of President Monroe this doctrine of the Farewell Address was first considered in all its aspects and with a view to all its practical consequences. The Farewell Address, while it took America out of the field of European politics, was silent as to the part Europe might be permitted to play in America. Doubtless it was thought the latest addition to the family of nations should not make haste to prescribe rules for the guidance of its older members, and the expediency and propriety of serving the powers of Europe with notice of a complete and distinctive American policy excluding them from interference with American political affairs might well seem dubious to a generation to whom the French alliance, with its manifold advantages to the cause of American independence, was fresh in mind.

Twenty years later, however, the situation had changed. The lately born nation had greatly increased in power and resources, had demonstrated its strength on land and sea and as well in the conflicts of arms as in the pursuits of peace, and had begun to realize the commanding position on this continent which the character of its people, their free institutions, and their remoteness from the chief scene of European contentions combined to give to it. The Monroe Administration therefore did not hesitate to accept and apply the logic of the Farewell Address by declaring in effect that American nonintervention in European affairs necessarily implied and meant European nonintervention in American affairs. Conceiving unquestionably that complete European noninterference in American concerns would be cheaply purchased by complete American noninterference in European concerns, President Monroe, in the celebrated message of December 2, 1823, used the following language:

"In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.

"With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the Government de facto as the legitimate Government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting, in all instances, the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents, circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference."

The Monroe Administration, however, did not content itself with formulating a correct rule for the regulation of the relations between Europe and America. It aimed at also securing the practical benefits to result from the application of the rule. Hence the message just quoted declared that the American continents were fully occupied and were not the subjects for future colonization by European powers. To this spirit and this purpose also are to be attributed the passages of the same message which treat any infringement of the rule against interference in American affairs on the part of the powers of Europe as an act of unfriendliness to the United States. It was realized that it was futile to lay down such a rule unless its observance could be enforced. It was manifest that the United States was the only power in this hemisphere capable of enforcing it. It was therefore courageously declared not merely that Europe ought not to interfere in American affairs, but that any European power doing so would be regarded as antagonizing the interests and inviting the opposition of the United States.

That America is in no part open to colonization, though the proposition was not universally admitted at the time of its first enunciation, has long been universally conceded. We are now concerned, therefore, only with that other practical application of the Monroe doctrine, the disregard of which by an European power is to be deemed an act of unfriendliness toward the United States. The precise scope and limitations of this rule can not be too clearly apprehended. It does not establish any general protectorate by the United States over other American States. It does not relieve any American State from its obligations as fixed by international law nor prevent any European power directly interested from enforcing such obligations or from inflicting merited punishment for the breach of them. It does not contemplate any interference in the internal affairs of any American State or in the relations between it and other American States. It does not justify any attempt on our part to change the established form of government of any American State or to prevent the people of such State from altering that form according to their own will and pleasure. The rule in question has but a single purpose and object. It is that no European power or combination of European powers shall forcibly deprive an American State of the right and power of self-government and of shaping for itself its own political fortunes and destinies.

That the rule thus defined has been the accepted public law of this country ever since its promulgation can not fairly be denied. Its pronouncement by the Monroe Administration at that particular time was unquestionably due to the inspiration of Great Britain, who at once gave to it an open and unqualified adhesion which has never been withdrawn. But the rule was decided upon and formulated by the Monroe Administration as a distinctively American doctrine of great import to the safety and welfare of the United States, after the most careful consideration by a Cabinet which numbered among its members John Quincy Adams, Calhoun, Crawford, and Wirt, and which, before acting, took both Jefferson and Madison into its counsels. Its promulgation was received with acclaim by the entire people of the country, irrespective of party. Three years after, Webster declared that the doctrine involved the honor of the country. "I look upon it," he said, "as part of its treasures of reputation, and for one I intend to guard it," and he added:

"I look on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will help neither to erase it nor to tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor."

Though the rule thus highly eulogized by Webster has never been formally affirmed by Congress, the House in 1864 declared against the Mexican monarchy sought to be set up by the French as not in accord with the policy of the United States, and in 1889 the Senate expressed its disapproval of the connection of any European power with a canal across the Isthmus of Darien or Central America. It is manifest that if a rule has been openly and uniformly declared and acted upon by the executive branch of the Government for more than seventy years without express repudiation by Congress, it must be conclusively presumed to have its sanction. Yet it is certainly no more than the exact truth to say that every Administration since President Monroe's has had occasion, and sometimes more occasions than one, to examine and consider the Monroe doctrine, and has in each instance given it emphatic indorsement. Presidents have dwelt upon it in messages to Congress and Secretaries of State have time after time made it the theme of diplomatic representation. Nor, if the practical results of the rule be sought for, is the record either meager or obscure.

Its first and immediate effect was indeed most momentous and far reaching. It was the controlling factor in the emancipation of South America and to it the independent States which now divide that region between them are largely indebted for their very existence. Since then the most striking single achievement to be credited to the rule is the evacuation of Mexico by the French upon the termination of the civil war. But we are also indebted to it for the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which both neutralized any interoceanic canal across Central America and expressly excluded Great Britain from occupying or exercising any dominion over any part of Central America. It has been used in the case of Cuba as if justifying the position that, while the sovereignty of Spain will be respected, the island will not be permitted to become the possession of any other European power. It has been influential in bringing about the definite relinquishment of any supposed protectorate by Great Britain over the Mosquito Coast.

President Polk, in the case of Yucatan and the proposed voluntary transfer of that country to Great Britain or Spain, relied upon the Monroe doctrine, though perhaps erroneously, when he declared in a special message to Congress on the subject that the United States could not consent to any such transfer. Yet, in somewhat the same spirit, Secretary Fish affirmed in 1870 that President Grant had but followed "the teachings of all our history" in declaring in his annual message of that year that existing dependencies were no longer regarded as subject to transfer from one European power to another, and that when the present relation of colonies ceases they are to become independent powers. Another development of the rule, though apparently not necessarily required by either its letter or its spirit, is found in the objection to arbitration of South American controversies by an European power. American questions, it is said, are for American decision, and on that ground the United States went so far as to refuse to mediate in the war between Chile and Peru jointly with Great Britain and France. Finally, on the ground, among others, that the authority of the Monroe doctrine and the prestige of the United States as its exponent and sponsor would be seriously impaired, Secretary Bayard strenuously resisted the enforcement of the Pelletier claim against Haiti.

"The United States," he said, "has proclaimed herself the protector of this Western World, in which she is by far the stronger power, from the intrusion of European sovereignties. She can point with proud satisfaction to the fact that over and over again has she declared effectively that serious indeed would be the consequences if European hostile foot should, without just cause, tread those States in the New World which have emancipated themselves from European control. She has announced that she would cherish as it becomes her the territorial rights of the feeblest of those States, regarding them not merely as in the eye of the law equal to even the greatest of nationalities, but in view of her distinctive policy as entitled to be regarded by her as the objects of a peculiarly gracious care. I feel bound to say that if we should sanction by reprisals in Haiti the ruthless invasion of her territory and insult to her sovereignty which the facts now before us disclose, if we approve by solemn Executive action and Congressional assent that invasion, it will be difficult for us hereafter to assert that in the New World, of whose rights we are the peculiar guardians, these rights have never been invaded by ourselves."

The foregoing enumeration not only shows the many instances wherein the rule in question has been affirmed and applied, but also demonstrates that the Venezuelan boundary controversy is in any view far within the scope and spirit of the rule as uniformly accepted and acted upon. A doctrine of American public law thus long and firmly established and supported could not easily be ignored in a proper case for its application, even were the considerations upon which it is founded obscure or questionable. No such objection can be made, however, to the Monroe doctrine understood and defined in the manner already stated. It rests, on the contrary, upon facts and principles that are both intelligible and incontrovertible. That distance and 3,000 miles of intervening ocean make any permanent political union between an European and an American State unnatural and inexpedient will hardly be denied. But physical and geographical considerations are the least of the objections to such a union. Europe, as Washington observed, has a set of primary interests which are peculiar to herself. America is not interested in them and ought not to be vexed or complicated with them.

Each great European power, for instance, to-day maintains enormous armies and fleets in self-defense and for protection against any other European power or powers. What have the States of America to do with that condition of things, or why should they be impoverished by wars or preparations for wars with whose causes or results they can have no direct concern? If all Europe were to suddenly fly to arms over the fate of Turkey, would it not be preposterous that any American State should find itself inextricably involved in the miseries and burdens of the contest? If it were, it would prove to be a partnership in the cost and losses of the struggle, but not in any ensuing benefits.

What is true of the material is no less true of what may be termed the moral interests involved. Those pertaining to Europe are peculiar to her and are entirely diverse from those pertaining and peculiar to America. Europe as a whole is monarchical, and, with the single important exception of the Republic of France, is committed to the monarchical principle. America, on the other hand, is devoted to the exactly opposite principle—to the idea that every people has an inalienable right of self-government—and in the United States of America has furnished to the world the most conspicuous and conclusive example and proof of the excellence of free institutions, whether from the standpoint of national greatness or of individual happiness. It can not be necessary, however, to enlarge upon this phase of the subject. Whether moral or material interests be considered, it can not but be universally conceded that those of Europe are irreconcilably diverse from those of America, and that any European control of the latter is necessarily both incongruous and injurious. If, however, for the reasons stated the forcible intrusion of European powers into American politics is to be deprecated—if, as it is to be deprecated, it should be resisted and prevented—such resistance and prevention must come from the United States. They would come from it, of course, were it made the point of attack. But if they come at all, they must also come from it when any other American State is attacked, since only the United States has the strength adequate to the exigency.

Is it true, then, that the safety and welfare of the United States are so concerned with the maintenance of the independence of every American State as against any European power as to justify and require the interposition of the United States whenever that independence is endangered? The question can be candidly answered in but one way. The States of America, South as well as North, by geographical proximity, by natural sympathy, by similarity of governmental constitutions, are friends and allies, commercially and politically, of the United States. To allow the subjugation of any of them by an European power is, of course, to completely reverse that situation and signifies the loss of all the advantages incident to their natural relations to us. But that is not all. The people of the United States have a vital interest in the cause of popular self-government. They have secured the right for themselves and their posterity at the cost of infinite blood and treasure. They have realized and exemplified its beneficent operation by a career unexampled in point of national greatness or individual felicity. They believe it to be for the healing of all nations, and that civilization must either advance or retrograde accordingly as its supremacy is extended or curtailed. Imbued with these sentiments, the people of the United States might not impossibly be wrought up to an active propaganda in favor of a cause so highly valued both for themselves and for mankind. But the age of the Crusades has passed, and they are content with such assertion and defense of the right of popular self-government as their own security and welfare demand. It is in that view more than in any other that they believe it not to be tolerated that the political control of an American State shall be forcibly assumed by an European power.

The mischiefs apprehended from such a source are none the less real because not immediately imminent in any specific case, and are none the less to be guarded against because the combination of circumstances that will bring them upon us can not be predicted. The civilized States of Christendom deal with each other on substantially the same principles that regulate the conduct of individuals. The greater its enlightenment, the more surely every State perceives that its permanent interests require it to be governed by the immutable principles of right and justice. Each, nevertheless, is only too liable to succumb to the temptations offered by seeming special opportunities for its own aggrandizement, and each would rashly imperil its own safety were it not to remember that for the regard and respect of other States it must be largely dependent upon its own strength and power. To-day the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition. Why? It is not because of the the pure friendship or good will felt for it. It is not simply by reason of its high character as a civilized State, nor because wisdom and justice and equity are the invariable characteristics of the dealings of the United States. It is because, in addition to all other grounds, its infinite resources, combined with its isolated position, render it master of the situation and practically invulnerable as against any or all other powers.

All the advantages of this superiority are at once imperiled if the principle be admitted that European powers may convert American States into colonies or provinces of their own. The principle would be eagerly availed of, and every power doing so would immediately acquire a base of military operations against us. What one power was permitted to do could not be denied to another, and it is not inconceivable that the struggle now going on for the acquisition of Africa might be transferred to South America. If it were, the weaker countries would unquestionably be soon absorbed, while the ultimate result might be the partition of all South America between the various European powers. The disastrous consequences to the United States of such a condition of things are obvious. The loss of prestige, of authority, and of weight in the councils of the family of nations would be among the least of them. Our only real rivals in peace as well as enemies in war would be found located at our very doors. Thus far in our history we have been spared the burdens and evils of immense standing armies and all the other accessories of huge warlike establishments, and the exemption has largely contributed to our national greatness and wealth as well as to the happiness of every citizen. But, with the powers of Europe permanently encamped on American soil, the ideal conditions we have thus far enjoyed can not be expected to continue. We, too, must be armed to the teeth; we, too, must convert the flower of our male population into soldiers and sailors, and by withdrawing them from the various pursuits of peaceful industry we, too, must pratically annihilate a large share of the productive energy of the nation.

How a greater calamity than this could overtake us it is difficult to see. Nor are our just apprehensions to be allayed by suggestions of the friendliness of European powers—of their good will toward us—of their disposition, should they be our neighbors, to dwell with us in peace and harmony. The people of the United States have learned in the school of experience to what extent the relations of States to each other depend not upon sentiment nor principle, but upon selfish interest. They will not soon forget that, in their hour of distress, all their anxieties and burdens were aggravated by the possibility of demonstrations against their national life on the part of powers with whom they had long maintained the most harmonious relations. They have yet in mind that France seized upon the apparent opportunity of our civil war to set up a monarchy in the adjoining State of Mexico. They realize that had France and Great Britain held important South American possessions to work from and to benefit, the temptation to destroy the predominance of the great Republic in this hemisphere by furthering its dismemberment might have been irresistible. From that grave peril they have been saved in the past and may be saved again in the future through the operation of the sure but silent force of the doctrine proclaimed by President Monroe. To abandon it, on the other hand, disregarding both the logic of the situation and the facts of our past experience, would be to renounce a policy which has proved both an easy defense against foreign aggression and a prolific source of internal progress and prosperity.

There is, then, a doctrine of American public law, well founded in principle and abundantly sanctioned by precedent, which entitles and requires the United States to treat as an injury to itself the forcible assumption by an European power of political control over an American State. The application of the doctrine to the boundary dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela remains to be made and presents no real difficulty. Though the dispute relates to a boundary line, yet, as it is between States, it necessarily imports political control to be lost by one party and gained by the other. The political control at stake, too, is of no mean importance, but concerns a domain of great extent—the British claim, it will be remembered, apparently expanded in two years some 33,000 square miles—and, if it also directly involves the command of the mouth of the Orinoco, is of immense consequence in connection with the whole river navigation of the interior of South America. It has been intimated, indeed, that in respect of these South American possessions Great Britain is herself an American State like any other, so that a controversy between her and Venezuela is to be settled between themselves as if it were between Venezuela and Brazil or between Venezuela and Colombia, and does not call for or justify United States intervention. If this view be tenable at all, the logical sequence is plain.
